

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY
OF CALIFORNIA
RIVERSIDE

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2008 with funding from Microsoft Corporation

MARIA EDGEWORTH

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

THE HOUSE IN ST. MARTIN'S STREET : Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, etc. Demy 8vo. Gilt Top.

JUNIPER HALL : A Rendezvous of certain Illustrious Personages during the French Revolution, including Alexandre d'Arblay and Fanny Burney. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and Reproductions from contemporary Portraits.

JANE AUSTEN : Her Homes and Her Friends. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and Reproductions from old Portraits.

STORY OF THE PRINCESS DES URSINS IN SPAIN (Camerera Mayor). With 12 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. New Edition.

Maria Edgeworth
drawn by. John Buck.
circa 1790

MARIA EDGEWORTH
AND HER CIRCLE IN THE DAYS OF BUONAPARTE AND BOURBON

BY

CONSTANCE HILL
'''

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS BY ELLEN G. HILL AND REPRODUCTIONS OF CONTEMPORARY PORTRAITS

LONDON : JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD
NEW YORK : JOHN LANE COMPANY · MCMX

PR4646
H5

Printed by BALLANTYNE & CO. LIMITED
Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, London

PREFACE

It is pleasant to be able to usher the reader into the genial presence of Maria Edgeworth even in this Preface. Here are her views upon such introductory compositions given in an unpublished letter to a young friend who had applied to her for criticism and advice.

“I feel as if I had been guilty of caprice or presumption,” she writes, “in the alterations and omissions I have made in the preface, and must therefore add an explanation and reason or two—quite contrary to my father’s system of giving no explanation or reason— But he is a man and I am but a woman.

“My general principles about prefaces are—that they should above all things be clear and simple—that the reader should not be perplexed, or have an idea of difficulty or labor at first setting out—therefore no fine writing, no twisted sentences— As to modesty, as much as you please—but it must be graceful, not awkward modesty—the reader likes a bow, as low as you can make it, to show submission and respect, but it must not be an unpractised bow—it must show that the maker is a gentleman, who has learned to dance.

Preface

“The reader does not care what trouble the poor author has had, or what difficulties or misfortunes he has met with unless he can contrive to make them interesting and this is a nice point—too much or too little said spoils all. As at a dinner, or entertainment you please your guests by suggesting that you have taken all possible pains to provide all the dainties of the season and all the delicacies suited to their individual tastes, but if you go a step further and bring all the kitchen and the labors of culinary preparations before their eyes you disgust and you are accused of ill-breeding and bad taste.”

Hoping to avoid such pit-falls we will proceed on our way!

In this work Miss Edgeworth's journeys to France and England are treated of, rather than her home life in Ireland; but to understand the character of our authoress we must think of her first at Edgeworthstown, living with her loved ather, her third step-mother (who was also her intimate friend), and her many brothers and sisters, all of whom were cherished in her warm heart. Amidst the gay sights of Paris,

Preface

which she keenly enjoyed, in company with two young sisters, Maria writes: "How happy we are to be so fond of each other; how happy we are to be independent of all we see here! How happy that we have our dear home to return to at last!"

Miss Edgeworth's was a life full of work—work among her father's tenantry, where she gained her intimate knowledge of the Irish nature, and of literary work which constitutes her fame.

In person Maria was small and slight of stature. Her features were not regular, we are told, but she had "bright blue, very blue eyes," and "a singularly pleasant voice." Her hands and feet were so delicately small as to be almost child-like. "In natural appearance," writes Walter Scott, "she is quite the fairy Whippity Stourie of our nursery tale, the Whippity Stourie who came flying through the window to work all sorts of marvels. I will never believe but what she has a wand in her pocket, and pulls it out to conjure a little before she begins those very striking pictures of manners." And another contemporary author says: "She more than once suggested to me the good fairy from whose lips dropped diamonds and pearls."

"Edgeworthstown," remarks a recent writer, "was for many years as much a shrine at which all visitors to Ireland did homage, as Abbotsford was to those who visited Scotland."

Preface

Marc Auguste Pictet, who made a pilgrimage to Edgeworthstown in 1801, gives us a pleasant glimpse of the family in his "Voyage de Trois Mois." The first day he called Miss Edgeworth happened to be away from home. "We talked of Maria," he says, "who appeared to me to be truly appreciated by her family. In the very parlour where we were seated there stood the little table upon which she wrote her charming works, in the midst of the general buzz of talk, and of the noise of her younger brothers and sisters."

Upon his second visit he found the family at breakfast; "but this time," he says, "Maria and Mr. Lovell Edgeworth (the eldest son) were seated at the table. . . . I had eyes only for her. . . . I felt persuaded that something remarkable in face or figure would at once betray the authoress. I was mistaken. A small figure—eyes bent down and little expression in the face, as long as she remained silent—this was my first impression. But when she spoke—which was too seldom in my opinion—nothing could be better thought out or better expressed than that which proceeded out of her mouth."

M. Pictet goes on to speak of Lovell and of his sister Charlotte, with both of whom the reader will soon become acquainted. "Lovell is a highly educated young man, just moulded by the University of Edinburgh, where all willing students may become learned; Miss Charlotte is a young girl of sixteen years of age, beautiful and fresh as a rose; whose eyes, brimful of intelligence, showed that although she would not venture to speak herself, she lost not a word of all the conversation that was going on around her; and also that she knew how to listen; not an ordinary talent in young persons. But in this house nothing is ordinary."

Preface

The period of time which the present volume covers is the first twenty years of last century; and the narrative therefore conducts the reader through the stirring times of the French wars, when the very name of "Boney" was a terror to English children. A hundred years ago preparations were being made throughout France for the invasion of England, and Buonaparte was devising methods of conveying his army across the Channel. A triumphal arch was actually erected in his honour at Calais bearing the inscription: "The Road to London."

That road has recently been traversed by the French in truly triumphant fashion—not indeed amid the roar of cannon, but amid the roar of welcoming cheers. When President Fallières, the guest of our King and country, reached our shores in May of last year, his vessel passed between the lines of our warships all decked in his honour, while the air rang with the "hurrahs" of our British tars and with the answering shouts of "Vive l'Angleterre!"

Preface

"Never within living memory," we are told, "had Dover been seen in such gorgeous gala attire or shown so splendid an enthusiasm." "C'est magnifique!" exclaimed a French spectator, "et c'est la paix!"

* * * * *

Before closing this Preface, we must acknowledge gratefully the kind help given by Mrs. Arthur G. Butler and other members of the Edgeworth family in the loan of unpublished material, and in furnishing information; for which latter we are also indebted to Madame la Duchesse de Broglie (née Armaillé) and Madame la Comtesse d'Armaillé (née Ségur), to Monsieur Pierre Amédée Pichot and to Monsieur Henri Manesse.

Portraits, drawings, letters and other objects have also been lent by the kindness of Mr. Bernard Holland, Mr. A. M. Broadley, Dr. Williamson, Mr. B. Quaritch, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and Monsieur le Prince de Broglie; also by members of the families of Mr. Sutton Sharpe and of Mrs. Barbauld.

Quotations from Miss Edgeworth's printed correspondence are taken from "A Memoir of Maria Edgeworth with a Selection from her Letters, by the late Mrs. Edgeworth, 3 vols., printed for private circulation, 1867." Much of the matter in this work is omitted in Mr. Augustus Hare's edition.

Preface

We are indebted to a grand-niece and namesake of the authoress for the loan of a gold enamelled chain given to Maria Edgeworth by Madame Récamier, which forms a decoration on the binding of this volume.

CONSTANCE HILL.

GROVE COTTAGE, FROGNAL, HAMPSTEAD,
July 1909.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. A PEACEFUL INVASION . . . . .	I
II. A WELCOME IN PARIS . . . . .	5
III. A GRACIOUS QUEEN OF SOCIETY . . . . .	16
IV. A SWEDISH LOVER . . . . .	27
V. PARISIAN GAETIES . . . . .	37
VI. THE GRAND REVIEW . . . . .	46
VII. PENELOPE AND CALYPSO . . . . .	56
VIII. A FLIGHT . . . . .	65
IX. THE UPRISING OF A NATION . . . . .	71
X. A PRISONER-OF-WAR . . . . .	77
XI. TALES OF FASHIONABLE LIFE . . . . .	88
XII. A WELCOME IN LONDON . . . . .	100
XIII. LONDON GAETIES . . . . .	111
XIV. THE TRAGIC AND THE COMIC MUSE . . . . .	120
XV. CHILDE HAROLD AND CORINNE . . . . .	125
XVI. HOPE DAWNS FOR THE DÉTENU . . . . .	132
XVII. THE BOURBONS RESTORED . . . . .	145
XVIII. NAPOLEON AT THE TUILERIES AGAIN . . . . .	154
XIX. THE GREAT ENCOUNTER . . . . .	160
XX. AFTER WATERLOO . . . . .	169

Contents

CHAPTER	PAGE
XXI. LITERARY DAUGHTERS . . . . .	182
XXII. THE "MANUSCRIT DE SAINTE-HÉLÈNE" . . . . .	189
XXIII. A HAMPSTEAD POETESS . . . . .	193
XXIV. AN HONOURED WRITER . . . . .	206
XXV. JOURNEYING HERE AND THERE . . . . .	216
XXVI. IN PARIS AGAIN . . . . .	225
XXVII. THE ABBAYE-AUX-BOIS . . . . .	239
XXVIII. PARISIAN SALONS IN 1820 . . . . .	250
XXIX. COPPET . . . . .	263
XXX. FAREWELL TO FRANCE . . . . .	276

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

	PAGE
Portrait of Maria Edgeworth, drawn by Adam Buck, the only artist to whom she ever sat, circa 1790 ( Taken from a family group in the possession of Mrs. Arthur G. Butler ) Frontispiece
The Porte St. Denis . . . . .	3
Ancient Signal Telegraph on the Heights of Montmartre . .	4
Notre Dame and the Seine . . . . .	9
Scroll from a Balcony at Fontainebleau . . . . .	15
Portrait of Madame Récamier by Gérard ( From the Collection of A. M. Broadley, Esq. ) . . . . . To face	18
Madame Récamier's Bedchamber . . . . .	20
The Residence of the de Pastorets . . . . .	31
Portrait of Charlotte Edgeworth when a Child, by Adam Buck . . . . . To face	38
Balcony on a Corner House of the Rue de Lille . . . .	42
Old Fanlight . . . . .	48
Napoleon ( After Meissonier ) . . . . . To face	50
Chair in Madame Récamier's House ( From a drawing by Sutton Sharpe ) . . . . .	55

List of Illustrations

	PAGE
Winter Costumes of 1803 . . . . .	64
Lord Whitworth ( From the portrait in the Louvre by Sir Thos. Lawrence ) . . . . . To face	66
Banners carried by the Westminster Volunteers in 1803 .	70
Silhouette of Lovell Edgeworth when a Child . To face	78
The Water-gate, Verdun . . . . .	81
Design on a Harp-lute . . . . .	87
Camelford Cottage, Mrs. Crewe's "Villa at Hampstead" .	91
Hampstead Heath ( By J. Constable ) . . . . . To face	94
Holles Street, showing No. 10 . . . . .	101
Mary Berry ( From a miniature by Mrs. Mee ) . To face	104
Portrait of Joanna Baillie ( By W. Newton ) . . . To face	108
Catherine Pakenham, First Duchess of Wellington ( From the original tinted drawing by Sir Thos. Lawrence, in the possession of his Grace the Duke of Wellington ) To face	114
La Valse as danced in 1802 ( From a contemporary print ) To face	116
Capo di Monte, Mrs. Siddons' Cottage at Hampstead .	119
Portrait of Mrs. Siddons ( By Sir Thos. Lawrence, taken in 1814 ). . . . . To face	122
Fashions of the Day . . . . .	131
Old Lamp over a Doorway . . . . .	144
Awaiting the Entry of Louis XVIII. into Paris . . .	148
Royal Monogram from a Balcony at Fontainebleau . .	159

List of Illustrations

	PAGE
Quai des Orfèvres, Paris . . . . .	168
Residence of the Duke of Wellington in Paris in 1815 . . . . .	173
Fanlight Design . . . . .	181
Old Mounting Block . . . . .	188
Bolton House, the Home of Joanna Baillie . . . . .	195
The Entrance Passage . . . . .	199
The Dining-parlour . . . . .	203
Joanna Baillie's Study . . . . .	204
Drawing-room, Maryon Hall . . . . .	208
No. 8 Church Row, the Home of the Aikins . . . . .	211
Anna Lætitia Barbauld . . . . .	To face 212
Old Carving on Chimney-piece in Grove Cottage . . . . .	215
A Corner of the Place du Palais Bourbon . . . . .	227
Portrait of the Marquis de Pastoret ( By Delaroche ) To face	230
The English Embassy . . . . .	234
Entrance to the Collège de France . . . . .	236
The Cloister Garden, Abbaye-aux-Bois . . . . .	243
Window of the "Cellule" . . . . .	249
Château de Neuilly, Palace of the Orleans Family To face	254
Bosquet des Dômes, Versailles . . . . .	259
Silhouette of Fanny Edgeworth . . . . .	To face 260
Château de Coppet, Cour d'Honneur . . . . .	265

List of Illustrations

	PAGE
Portrait of Albertine de Staël, Duchesse de Broglie ( By Gérard, from the original picture in the possession of the Prince de Broglie ) . . . . . To face	270
Village of Coppet and Château from Lake of Geneva . . . . .	272
Old Pier, Dover . . . . .	282

The central design on the binding of this book represents a travelling-coach of the period. The frame is a copy of a gold enamelled chain presented by Madame Récamier to Maria Edgeworth

MARIA EDGEWORTH

CHAPTER I

A PEACEFUL INVASION

IN the autumn of the year 1801 rumours were spreading far and wide that a treaty of peace with France would soon be signed—France, which for ten years had been a closed country to her English neighbours.

Mrs. Barbauld, writing to a friend in the month of October, says: "I want to wish you joy on the peace, which came at last so unexpectedly, and almost overwhelmed us with the good news. We have hardly done illuminating and bouncing and popping upon the occasion. And now France lies like a huge loadstone on the other side of the Channel, and will draw every mother's child of us to it. Those who know French are refreshing their memories—those who do not are learning it; and every one is planning in some way or other to get a sight of the promised land."

The Peace of Amiens was not finally ratified until the end of March 1802, but as soon as that act was accomplished, English visitors of all sorts hurried over to the French capital. They were eager to see the city "over which the revolutionary storm had swept, and which had since been enriched with the spoils of Europe."

Maria Edgeworth

Maria Edgeworth, in her distant Irish home, had always been in touch with French persons of interest who, from time to time, had visited Edgeworthstown, and now that the gates of France were at last thrown open the temptation to enter them was felt to be powerful; so powerful indeed that the scheme of a visit to Paris was forthwith conceived. This scheme took practical shape in the following month of September, when Mr. and Mrs. Edgeworth, Maria and her young sister Charlotte left Edgeworthstown en route for France.

On reaching London the travellers halted, for a few days, at Nerot's Hotel—an inn which formerly stood in Clifford Street, Bond Street. During their short sojourn in town, Mr. Edgeworth, we are told, purchased a "roomy coach" in which the family could perform their journeys on the Continent, in accordance with the custom of the time.

On October 4, the Edgeworths landed at Calais after having had "a very rough passage across the Channel, which lasted three hours and a half." This must have been a comparatively quick passage for those days of sailing-packets, for another traveller speaks of a crossing lasting as long as thirteen hours.

A Peaceful Invasion

The Edgeworths went to Paris by a circuitous route in order to see some of the Flemish and Brabantian towns. "We left Gravelines," writes

THE PORTE ST. DENIS

Maria, "with an equipage at which Sobriety herself could not have forborne to laugh. To our London coach were fastened by long rope traces, six Flemish horses of different heights, but each large and clumsy enough to have drawn an English waggon. The nose of the foremost horse was thirty-five feet from the body of the coach; their hoofs [were] all shaggy, their manes all uncombed and high, high upon their backs sat perfectly perpendicular, long-waisted postillions in jack-boots with pipes in their mouths."

Maria Edgeworth

From Gravelines the party proceeded to Dunkirk, Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, Valenciennes, Cambrai and Chantilly, and finally reached the French capital on the afternoon of October 29. We fancy we see the family coach with its horses and postillions turning under the great archway of the Porte St. Denis and Maria looking eagerly out of the window for her first sight of "la grande ville de Paris."

CHAPTER II

A WELCOME IN PARIS

IN a letter dated "Paris, Wednesday," Maria Edgeworth writes: "We arrived about three o'clock, and lodged for a few days at the Hôtel de Courlande . . . a magnificent hotel in the fine square, formerly Place Louis Quinze, afterwards Place de la Révolution, and now Place de la Concorde. Here the guillotine was once at work night and day, and here died Louis Seize and Marie Antoinette and Madame Roland. Opposite to us is the Seine and La Lanterne."

"In the middle of this Place, which is between the Champs Elysées and the Tuileries," writes Charlotte Edgeworth, "the Revolutionists erected a statue, which they called the Statue of Liberty. The guillotine was erected opposite, that it might appear that when the heads of the victims were cut off they bowed to the statue. . . ."

"There is a woman in the madhouse [here] who is well known to have been at the head of one of the troops of women assassins . . . who still begs for money to give to Marat and Robespierre, whom she calls 'des braves gens,' and who repeats the same words that she was employed to cry out to the mobs."

Maria Edgeworth

We wonder if this woman was "la belle Liégeoise," mentioned by Thiers, who became insane after her deeds of violence.

Miss Edgeworth writes on October 31: "I left off at the Hôtel de Courlande. We were told there was a fine view of Paris from the leads, and so indeed there is; and the first object that struck us was the telegraph at work!"

Mr. Edgeworth had invented one of the earliest semaphore telegraphs, which was then gradually coming into use. It was his apparatus which signalled the first message across the sea between Ireland and Scotland.

"The first voiture de remise (job-coach in plain English) into which we got," continues the writer, "had belonged to—whom do you think?—to the Princess Elizabeth. The Abbé Edgeworth had probably been in this very coach with her."

On leaving the Hôtel de Courlande, the Edgeworths took up their abode in a house in the Rue de Lille, a street which lies to the south of the Seine and runs parallel with the Quai de Voltaire. The address given in their letters is, "chez le Citoyen Verber, Rue de Lille, Nu. 525."

This high number, it seems, marked the position of the house in a whole district, and not in the street itself: a mode of numbering which makes it difficult now to identify any given dwelling-place. The only clue to the position of the Edgeworths' house is that it faced the Hôtel de Villeroy. The Rue de Lille, like most of the older streets in the Faubourg St. Germain, is composed of tall, dignified-looking houses, whose large portes cochère open, for the most part, into spacious court-yards.

A Welcome in Paris

Paris, as the Edgeworths saw it in 1802, was a very different place to what it is now. Carlyle, writing as late as 1824, says: "With few exceptions the streets are narrow, crowded and unclean; the kennel in the middle, and a lamp over it here and there on a rope [stretched] from side to side. There are no footpaths."

The poet Rogers, who visited the French capital, like the Edgeworths, in the autumn of 1802, has given a graphic description of the life of the city as he found it. "I wish I could give you a tableau de Paris," he writes to an English friend. "But where shall we begin? With the narrow streets, where the approach of a voiture or of a cabriolet, with its tinkling bell and its cry of 'Garde! Garde!' produces a flight and a rout; or with the squares and bridges, where an array of shoe-blacks, formidable in number and outcry, salute you with 'Ici on tond des chiens et coupe les

Maria Edgeworth

oreilles aux chiens et chats'; or shall we walk in the Tuileries Gardens, where there are more statues than trees; or shall we look into the bals bourgeois, where a hundred couples waltz nightly; or are you inclined for a spectacle? Will you see 'Puss in Boots' wash her whiskers with her paws, as she does every evening in the boulevards, to the delight of all the grown children; or shall I introduce you to Mdlle. Duchenois, who was crowned last night in Phèdre amidst tears and acclamations? No, rather come with me and admire 'those gay creatures of the element,' the corps de ballet, who will enchant you with their delicate movements and with their beautiful groups in groves and caverns, and among the 'plighted clouds.' . . ."

"The French are a lively and clever people. . . . In the comforts of life they are many centuries behind us, but in its elegancies they have no rivals; and in their liberality to strangers they are models for the rest of the world."

"The day after our arrival," writes Maria Edgeworth, "M. Delessert (he whom M. Pictet describes as a French Rumford) invited us to spend the evening with his mother and sister. We went, found an excellent house, a charming family, with whom we felt we were perfectly acquainted after we had been in the room with them for five minutes."

A Welcome in Paris

These words recall a sentence in "Manœuvring": "Characters that are free from artifice immediately coalesce, as metals that are perfectly pure can be readily cemented together."

The happy meeting described must have taken place in the Hôtel d'Uzès in the Rue Montmartre, where the Delesserts were then living.

NOTRE DAME AND THE SEINE

"Madame Delessert, the mother, an elderly lady of about sixty," continues Maria, "has the species of politeness and conversation that my Aunt Ruxton has. I need not say how much I like her. Her daughter, Madame Gautier, has fine, large black eyes—very obliging and sensible, and well dressed. . . . Rousseau's "Letters on Botany" were written for this lady; he was a friend of the family."

This statement is confirmed by a French writer

Maria Edgeworth

—M. Bourdon—who tells us that J. J. Rousseau wrote expressly for Madame Delessert and her young daughter his “Lettres sur la Botanique.” He also made for them a herbal of flowers dried by himself and inscribed with his own hand in both Latin and French. This memorable relic, preserved with care in the Delessert family, was shown to M. Bourdon.

To return to Maria’s account. “Madame Gautier,” she says, “does not live in Paris but at a country-house at Passy, the Richmond of Paris, about two miles out of town. She invited us to spend a day there, and a most pleasant day we passed. The situation beautiful, the house furnished with elegance and good sense, the society most agreeable.

“[Among the guests present were] Madame de Pastoret, a literary and fashionable lady, and M. de Pastoret, her husband, a man of diplomatic knowledge; Lord Henry Petty, son of Lord Lansdowne, with whom my father had much conversation; the Swiss Ambassador, whose name I will not attempt to spell; M. Dumont, a Swiss gentleman travelling with Lord Henry Petty, very sensible and entertaining; * . . . M. d’Etaing, of whom I know nothing; and last, but indeed not least, the Abbé Morellet, of whom you have heard my father speak.

* M. Dumont made Jeremy Bentham’s principles and theories known to the French.

A Welcome in Paris

“O! my dear Aunt Mary,* how you would love that man, and we need not be afraid of loving him for he is near eighty. But it is impossible to believe that he is so old when one either hears him speak or sees him move. He has all the vivacity, and feeling, and wit of youth, and all the gentleness that youth ought to have. His conversation is delightful, nothing too much or too little; sense and gaiety, and learning and reason, and that perfect knowledge of the world which mixes so well but so seldom with a knowledge of books.

“He invited us to breakfast, and this morning we spent with him. . . . He has a sister living with him, Mme. de Montigny, an aimable, sensible woman. Her daughter was married to Marmontel, who died a few years ago; she, alas! is not in Paris.”

The names of M. and Mme. de Pastoret occur often in Miss Edgeworth's letters. Her first acquaintance with them soon ripened into friendship.

The Pastorets occupied a house which is now No. 6 in the Place de la Concorde, in the same row of stately buildings of which the Hôtel de Courlande formed one.

“Maria told you of M. and Mme. de Pastoret,”

* Miss Mary Sneyd.

Maria Edgeworth

writes Mr. Edgeworth to a relative. "In the same house on another floor . . . we met M. and Mme. Suard. He is accounted one of the most refined critics of Paris, and has for many years been at the head of newspapers of different denominations: at present he is at the head of the Publiciste. . . . Madame Suard has the remains of much beauty, a bel esprit, and aims at singularity and independence of sentiment. Would you believe it, Mr. Day paid his court to her thirty years ago?"

The eccentric Thomas Day, author of "Sandford and Merton," had been an intimate friend and companion of Mr. Edgeworth in early life, as the reader will remember, and was the prototype of the hero of Maria Edgeworth's admirable story of "Forester." Holding, like Forester, strongly democratic opinions, he had a contempt for all the refinements of life, and was especially "suspicious of the female sex and averse to risking his happiness for their charms." He paid a visit to France between the years 1760 and 1770, and it must have been then that he had succumbed to the attractions of the lively and beautiful Mdlle. Panckouke (afterwards Mme. Suard). In a letter to his friend Edgeworth, Day describes humorously the change that was being wrought in his outward appearance and manners under Parisian influences.

A Welcome in Paris

“Oh, my dear friend,” he says, “you’d be quite surprised to see me now—Oh Lord! I am quite another thing to what I was. I talks French like anything; I wears a velvet coat and a fine waistcoat, all over gold, and dresses quite comme il faut; and trips about with my hat under my arm, and ‘Serviteur, Monsieur,’ and ‘J’ai l’honneur, Madame,’ &c. Oh dear, it’s charming upon my soul!—good night—my paper’s out and I must dress for the concert. I pity you poor country puts, that see nothing of the world, and when I return, will try to teach you how to behave.”

The names of M. and Mme. Suard, as well as those of the Abbé Morellet, Marmontel—and many others that occur in the Edgeworth letters,—carry us back in thought to the great days of the French salons—even to that of the celebrated Mme. Geoffrin. It is to Mme. Suard’s pen that we owe the best description of that lady’s appearance in later life, just as we see it in Chardin’s fine portrait. Mme. Suard speaks of “her tall figure, her silver hair surmounted by a lace cap fastened beneath the chin, of her noble and dignified bearing, and of her ‘air de raison mêlé à la bonté.’”

There is a pretty story of Mme. Geoffrin’s connection with the Suards given in Janet Aldis’s interesting work upon Madame Geoffrin.

Maria Edgeworth

Suard, we are told, when he first arrived in Paris as a young literary man without either friends or fortune, had received much kindness from the great salonière—a kindness seasoned however with a good deal of sage advice. When, one day, he informed her that he intended to marry the young Mdle. Panckouke, who, he confessed, had no dot, Mme. Geoffrin urged him strongly to abandon his scheme. But finding him immovable, she waxed so bitter in her wrath against the self-willed folly of youth that his proud spirit rebelled, and he left her in anger.

He was married soon afterwards to Mdle. Panckouke, and for several years Suard saw nothing of his old friend. At last a common friend, Mme. Necker, determined to bring about a meeting between Mme. Geoffrin and Mme. Suard.

Neither of the ladies in question knew of Mme. Necker's intention, and when Mme. Geoffrin learned that the beautiful and modest woman (on the opposite side of the dinner-table) was Suard's young wife, she looked at her with so much interest that the lady was almost disconcerted.

When the meal was finished Mme. Geoffrin went up to Mme. Suard and began to make herself pleasant to her in her own tactful way. She inquired about their home-life, and drew forth a confession that they had not grown very rich. Then she graciously promised to visit them.

A Welcome in Paris

“The next day,” writes Mme. Suard, “my porter brought me a parcel in which I found a superb dress. I went to thank Mme. Geoffrin, for I did not doubt that the present came from her. She forbade me to mention it to any one.”

Presently Suard was announced, and the imperious but true-hearted woman, who never feared to own herself mistaken, threw herself into his arms.

“I was wrong, I was wrong!” she cried in contrition. “Though she has no dot, she is worth more than the most tranquil celibacy or the richest marriage.”*

* See “Madame Geoffrin, her Salon and her Times,” by Janet Aldis. Published by Methuen & Co.

CHAPTER III

A GRACIOUS QUEEN OF SOCIETY

MISS EDGEWORTH writes in December 1802 to her cousin Miss Ruxton:*

“My aunt asks me what I think of French society? All I have seen of it I like extremely, but we hear from all sides that we see only the best of Paris—the men of literature and the ancienne noblesse. . . . It is no easy matter to get into [this] agreeable society. We hear that many English of rank and fortune far, far superior to ours cannot force or win or buy their way into it. They put their trust in chariots and in horses—which are of little, or no avail except with les nouveaux riches, who are not worth seeing or hearing. . . . My father has seen something of them at Madame Tallien’s (now Cabarus), and was disgusted.

“Madame Récamier is of quite an opposite sort, though in the first fashion a graceful and decent

* The quotations from Maria Edgeworth’s letters in this chapter are taken principally from unpublished MSS.

A Gracious Queen of Society

beauty of excellent character. . . . We have dined at her house (one room in which is said to have cost £20,000) with tragic and comic poets, metaphysicians, and bankers, and the richest man in Paris; beside whom Charlotte had the felicity of sitting at dinner.

“ I must further inform you that we have been at the Opera with Mme. Récamier, and . . . at one of her balls. . . . She is very pretty and graceful, but nothing marvellous—except what is marvellous in a beauty who has been born and bred in flattery, and nursed in the lap of luxury, she is good in every sense of the word. She is obliging in her manners, and seems to think of others more than of herself.

“ She produces a great sensation whenever she appears in public.”

Mme. Récamier had visited England in the spring of this same year, and Mr. Edgeworth speaks of her in one of his letters as “the beautiful lady who had been nearly squeezed to death in London.” So modest and so unself-conscious, however, had been her deportment there that a journalist of the day writes: “She appears not to hear all the praise and not to see all the flattering attentions of which she is the object everywhere. A witty man said to her yesterday, ‘Madame, you intend to leave here then, without having seen Madame Récamier?’”

Sainte-Beuve speaks of her at this epoch as

Maria Edgeworth

“brillante fêtée, applaudie, la plus jeune reine des élégances.”

Kotzebue, who visited Paris in 1804, and met her in society, noticed that she wore no diamonds. “Amiability, grace, and modesty,” he says, “are the three graces that preside over her toilette.”

At the time the Edgeworths were in Paris M. and Mme. Récamier were living in a house in the Rue du Mont-Blanc (afterwards known as the Chaussée d’Antin). This house, or “Hôtel,” as it was then called, had formerly belonged to Necker, who sold it to M. Récamier in 1798. The negotiations for this sale led to a meeting between Necker’s daughter, Mme. de Staël, and Mme. Récamier, which, it seems, was the origin of their lifelong friendship.

M. Récamier, who was a wealthy banker, had spared no money in rendering his new house beautiful in every detail. A celebrated architect of the day—Berthaut—had been given carte blanche in the rearrangement of the rooms and in the design of the furniture. He had transformed the dwelling, says a contemporary writer, “into a veritable fairy palace.”

Miss Berry has given us a description of the suite of apartments. Writing in April 1802, she says: “Went to the house of Mme. Récamier. We were resolved not to leave Paris without seeing what is called the most elegant house in it.

Gérard, Peint.

MADAME RÉCAMIER

A Gracious Queen of Society

There are no large rooms nor a great many of them, but it is certainly fitted up with all the recherché and expense possible in what is now called le goût antique. . . . All the chairs are mahogany enriched with ormolu, and covered either with cloth or silk; those in the salon trimmed with flat gold lace in good taste."

"Mme. Récamier," writes the poet Rogers, "outshines the Consul himself! Her bath and bedchamber are hung with silks of many colours and lighted with aromatic lamps and alabaster vases. Her bed is an Etruscan couch, and every table is supported by caryatides in bronze and gold."

"Her bed is reckoned the most beautiful in Paris," writes Miss Berry. "The curtains are muslin-trimmed . . . with gold lace . . . [and are] suspended from a sort of carved couronne de roses, and tucked up in drapery upon the wall."

A coloured drawing of this bedroom was made by Sutton Sharpe (the elder), who was in Paris in 1802. It accords in every detail with the foregoing descriptions. Our illustration is taken from this drawing. Mr. Sharpe remarks in a letter of this same date: "Madame Récamier's bedchamber is more superb than I could have conceived."

Besides the town-house, the Récamiers possessed at this time the Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, which they used as a summer residence. Clichy

Maria Edgeworth

being within reach of Paris, they were able to keep up intercourse with their friends, and many a fête

MADAME RÉCAMIER'S BEDCHAMBER

was given by them in their fine grounds, which sloped down to the banks of the Seine.

One of their friends—a certain Baronne de V.—a lady who held a high post in the Consular Court,

A Gracious Queen of Society

has happily described for us the life at Clichy-la-Garenne.*

“It was there that Madame Récamier ought to be seen,” she writes, “for it was there, in the country, in the midst of the poor whom she clothed and tended, that one learnt to know her very soul, which was yet more perfect than the charming casket in which it was enclosed.”

The Baronne has given an account of a fête-day at the château.

On arriving there one morning at ten o'clock she found a large assemblage already gathered in the salon, amongst whom were representatives of all shades of opinion and politics. They had been invited to meet some English guests of note, including Charles James Fox and Lord and Lady Holland. The Baronne noticed some signs of embarrassment in this mixed company, but no sooner had the door opened to admit their gracious hostess, who had been absent at early mass, than all such feeling was dispelled, and ease and cheerfulness at once prevailed.

After déjeuner the company took a stroll in the park, and when they again met in the castle they found, to their pleasure, that a treat of no common kind awaited them. The great actor Talma was * See “Mémoires de Constant, Premier Valet de l'Empereur,” in which the Baronne de V.'s Mémoires are incorporated.

Maria Edgeworth

about to declaim some passages from French translations of Othello and of Macbeth, a choice made by Mme. Récamier in compliment to her English guests. "He needed only to pass his hand through his hair," remarks the Baronne, "and to contract his brows to appear the very impersonation of the Moor of Venice . . . so much so that terror seized upon his audience." He next gave Macbeth's account of his interview with the witches, of which the closing words in the French are:

Et tous trois dans les airs en fuyant loin de moi
M'ont laissé pour adieu ces mots, Tu seras roi.

"The low, mysterious voice of the actor, as he pronounced these words, the way in which he placed his finger on his lips, while his whole expression changed to one of horror at the remembrance of the loathsome vision, all combined to produce an effect as new to us as it was marvellous, and of which no description can give an idea.

". . . After the departure of Talma the company were entertained by music, [when] Madame Récamier, being pressed to sing, sat down to her harp and accompanied herself in a graceful song by Plantade. Need I add," remarks the Baronne, "that we were all enraptured with the voice of Madame Récamier?"

More guests arrived, among whom were the Duchess of Gordon and her beautiful daughter, the

A Gracious Queen of Society

Lady Georgiana. "The virgin modesty of this belle Anglaise," we are told, "the sweetness and charm of her eyes and of her whole expression, attracted universal admiration."

Next appeared the great dancer Vestris, who had come, supposing Mme. Récamier to be alone, to superintend the rehearsal of a gavotte—a gavotte of his own composition—to be danced the following evening at a ball by both Mme. Récamier and the Lady Georgiana. "There could be no question," observes the Baronne, "as to the impropriety of allowing such a master of his art as Vestris to make an expedition to Clichy in vain, and the two ladies therefore consented to perform the gavotte in our presence. It was danced to the music of a harp and horn.

"Never surely did nymphs more light of foot charm mortal eyes! Madame Récamier held a tambourine in her hand, which she raised above her head at each movement of the dance with renewed grace; while the Lady Georgiana, of more timid mood, holding a light scarf in her hand instead of a tambourine, seemed wishful to use it for a veil. Thus there appeared in all their attitudes a combination of happy ease and of gentle coyness which lent yet further charms to forms the most beautiful.

". . . In the midst of the general enthusiasm," adds the writer, "it was amusing to note the ecstasy of the good Vestris, who seemed to attribute all this poetry of form, of movement, of expression, and of attitude to the sole inspiration of his own genius!”

Maria Edgeworth

Here an interlude occurred bringing with it a dance of a very different description.

Mme. Récamier conducted her guests in a stroll through the village of Clichy, where a peasant wedding had just taken place, and where in the garden of the inn the newly married pair and their friends were all dancing.

“Madame Récamier,” says the Baronne, “persuaded us to join in this fête champêtre; and presently might be seen tall, dignified diplomatists and portly financiers endeavouring to rival in agility the capers of the merry peasants.”

On returning once more to the château the company found among the latest arrivals Mme. de Staël, Mme. Viotte, General Marmont and his wife, and the Marquis and Marquise de Luchesini. The acting of proverbs and charades was now proposed.

“We began,” says the writer, “by some dramatic scenes; the first being Hagar in the Wilderness. Madame de Staël took the part of Hagar, her young son the part of Ishmael, and Madame Récamier that of the angel. Madame de Staël (who acted with great pathos) seemed, as she stood before us, her long, dishevelled hair hanging about her shoulders, the very character incarnate of Hagar, whilst Madame Récamier, in her pure and celestial beauty, seemed the actual impersonation of the heavenly messenger.”

A Gracious Queen of Society

Charades succeeded, in which every one present took part, some performing their rôles well, others ill—“the most awkward affording the most amusement.”

At eleven o'clock supper was served—that “meal of confidence and friendship which forms so pleasantly the closing act of a day's comedy.”

At midnight the company dispersed, and the fête of Clichy-la-Garenne came to an end.

Mme. Récamier counted among her chosen friends many artists and authors. She understood their sensitive natures, and was ever ready to listen with sympathy to their personal confidences. “Elle écoutait avec séduction,” remarks Sainte-Beuve. She had a friendship with La Harpe which dated from the days of her childhood. This poet was afflicted with an irascible temper, which greatly annoyed his acquaintance, and often turned them into enemies, but he was uniformly amiable in his deportment towards his gentle young friend.

Maria Edgeworth, writing from Paris in December 1802, says:

“We went with Madame Récamier to La Harpe's house to hear him repeat some of his own verses. He lives in a wretched house, and we went up dirty stairs, through dirty passages, where I wondered how fine ladies' trains and noses could go, and were received in a dark, small den by the philosopher . . . in a dirty reddish nightgown, and very dirty nightcap bound round the forehead with a superlatively dirty chocolate-coloured ribbon. [Here] we met the celebrated English wit Lady Elizabeth Foster and a Russian Princess Dalgourski, who, when she was presented to Madame Bonaparte, wore a diadem of diamonds worth twenty thousand pounds! [In fact] La Harpe had a levée, or rather a couchée, of fine ladies.

Maria Edgeworth

“Madame Récamier, the beautiful, the elegant, robed in white satin, trimmed with white fur, seated herself on the elbow of his arm-chair . . . and used all the soft persuasion of the Graces to prevail upon him to repeat some verses. He took hold of her arm, stroked the white satin and fur, and said, ‘Ah, ma belle Julie, que je vous aime aujourd’hui, vous voilà bien habillée.’ . . . La Harpe is writing a poem on the death of the King of France in which he has introduced the Abbé Edgeworth. He complained that the name of Edgeworth was so unmanageable in verse that he was obliged to modify it, and to sweeten it to his own taste—whether he has sweetened it to ours we cannot tell.”

CHAPTER IV

A SWEDISH LOVER

MARIA EDGEWORTH, writing soon after her arrival in Paris, says: "We have been to the Théâtre Français and to the Théâtre Feydau, both fine houses: decorations, &c., superior to English: acting much superior in comedy; in tragedy they bully and rant and throw themselves into Academy attitudes too much."

No great tragic actor happened to be in Paris just at that time; but Maria had been fortunate in seeing both Talma and his wife perform at a theatre in Brussels. "The play," she says, "was Racine's Andromaque. Madame Talma played Andromaque, and her husband Orestes; both exquisitely well. I had no idea of fine acting till I saw them, and my father, who had seen Garrick, and Mrs. Siddons, and Yates, and Le Kain, says he never saw anything superior to Madame Talma."

The Rev. Edward Stanley, who saw Talma act in the play of Manlius a few years later, thus describes the effect he produced upon his audience:

Maria Edgeworth

“To the thunder of applause [upon the rising of the curtain], succeeded a breathless silence—Talma stepped forth in the Roman toga of Manlius. His figure is bad, short and rather clumsy, his countenance deficient in dignity and natural expression, but with all these deductions, he shines like a meteor when compared with Kemble. He is body and soul, finger and thumb, head and foot, involved in his character; and so say you [in England] is Miss O’Neil, but Talma and Miss O’Neil are different and distant as the poles. She is nature, he is art, but it is the perfection of art, and so splendid a specimen well deserves the approbation he so profusely receives.”*

Charlotte Edgeworth remarks in one of her letters: “Maria is writing a story, and has a little table by the fire at which she sits, as she used to do at Edgeworthstown, for half an hour together without stirring with her pen in her hand; then she scribbles on very fast.”

It seems that this story was the charming tale of “Mme. de Fleury,” the scene of which is laid in Paris at the time of the Revolution. It opens with an incident which the reader may remember. Some poor children, locked up during the absence of their mother, who is the breadwinner, meet with an accident, and the screams of a child with a broken arm arrest the attention of Mme. de Fleury, passing in her carriage down the miserable street. After effecting the release and proper treatment of the injured child, Mme. de Fleury opens a "Shelter" for children who have no one to guard them at home, and the "Shelter" gradually becomes an infants' school.

* “Before and after Waterloo,” by Edward Stanley, sometime Bishop of Norwich.

A Swedish Lover

These incidents were facts in the life of Mme. de Pastoret, who related them to Miss Edgeworth. Her infants' school was the first established in Paris. The description of Mme. de Fleury's imprisonment in her own house in the Place de la Concorde during the Reign of Terror, and of her being forced by her jailors to witness the executions which took place before her windows, were also incidents in the life of Mme. de Pastoret.

The name of "Fleury" was taken by Miss Edgeworth from the country-seat of the de Pastorets—the Château de Fleury.

Miss Edgeworth writes to her aunt, Mrs. Ruxton, on December 1 :

"I have been treasuring up for some time everything I have seen and heard which I think would interest you; and now my little head is so full that I must empty it, or it would certainly burst. . . .

"I wish I could paint the different people we have seen in little William's magic-lantern, and show them to you. At Madame Delessert's house there are, and have been for years, meetings of the most agreeable and select society in Paris. . . . To recommend Madame Delessert still more powerfully to you, I must tell you that she was the benefactress of Rousseau; he was, it is said, never good or happy except in her society; to her bounty he owed his retreat in Switzerland. She is nobly charitable, but if it were not for her friends no one would find out half the good she does. One of her acts of beneficence is recorded in Berquin's 'Ami des Enfants,' but even her own children cannot tell in which story it is. Her daughter, Madame Gautier, gains upon our esteem every day.

Maria Edgeworth

"Turn the handle of the magic-lantern. Who is this graceful figure, with all the elegance of Court manners and all the simplicity of domestic virtue? She is Madame de Pastoret. She was chosen preceptress to the Princess in the ancien régime in opposition to the wife of Condorcet, and M. de Pastoret had I forget how many votes more than Condorcet when it was put to the vote who should be preceptor to the Dauphin at the beginning of the Revolution. . . . [M. de Pastoret] was President of the First Assembly, and at the head of the King's Council: the four other Ministers of that Council all perished! He escaped by his courage. As for her, the Marquis de Chastelleux's speech describes her: 'Elle n'a point d'expression sans grâce, et point de grâce sans expression.'

"Turn the magic-lantern. Here comes Madame

THE RESIDENCE OF THE DE PASTORETIS

A Swedish Lover

Suard and Monsieur, a member of the Academy; very good company at their house. Among others, Lally Tollendal . . . said to be more eloquent than any man in France; M. de Montmorenci, worthy of his great name.

“Push on the magic-lanthorn slide. Here comes Boissy d’Anglas: a fine head! Such a head as you may imagine the man to have who, by his single courage, restrained the fury of one of the National Assemblies when the head of one of the deputies was cut off and set on the table before him.

“Next comes Camille Jordan, with great eloquence of pen, not of tongue; and M. de Prony, a great mathematician, of whom you don’t care to know more, but you would if you heard him.

“Who comes next? Madame Campan, mistress of the first boarding-school here, who educated Madame Louis Buonaparte, and who professes to keep her pupils entirely separate from servants, according to ‘Practical Education,’ and who paid us many compliments. . . . At Madame Campan’s, as my father told you, we met the beautiful Madame Récamier. . . .

“Who comes next? Kosciusko, cured of his wounds, simple in his manners, like all truly great men. . . .

“Who comes next? M. de Leuze, who translated the ‘Botanic Garden’ as well as it could be translated into Fénelon prose; and M. and Madame de

Maria Edgeworth

Vindé, who have a superb gallery of paintings, and the best concerts in Paris, and a library of eighteen thousand volumes, counted and well arranged; and what charms me more than either the books or the pictures, a little grand-daughter of three years old, very like my sweet Fanny. . . . She sat on my knee and caressed me with her soft, warm little hands, and looked at me with her smiling, intelligent eyes.

“Dec. 3.—Here I am at the brink of the last page, and I have said nothing of the Apollo, the Invalides, or Les Sourds et Muets. What shall I do? I cannot speak of everything at once, and when I speak to you so many things crowd upon my mind.

* * * * *

“Here, my dear Aunt, I was interrupted in a manner that will surprise you as much as it surprised me, by the coming in of M. Edelcrantz, a Swedish gentleman whom we have mentioned to you, of superior understanding and mild manners. He came to offer me his hand and heart!!

“My heart, you may suppose, cannot return his attachment, for I have seen but very little of him, and have not had time to form any judgment, except that I think nothing could tempt me to leave my own dear friends to live in Sweden.

“My dearest Aunt, I write to you the first moment, as next to my father and mother no person in the world feels so much interest in all that concerns me. I need not tell you that my father, 'such in this moment as in all the past,' is kindness itself: kindness far superior to what I deserve, but I am grateful for it."

A Swedish Lover

Writing to her cousin, Miss Sophy Ruxton, a few days later, Maria says: "I take it for granted, my dear friend, that you have by this time seen a letter I wrote a few days ago to my aunt. To you, as to her, every thought of my mind is open. I persist in refusing to leave my country and my friends to live at the Court of Stockholm, and [M. Edelcrantz] tells me (of course) that there is nothing he would not sacrifice for me except his duty: he has been all his life in the service of the King of Sweden, has places under him, is actually employed in collecting information for a large political establishment. He thinks himself bound in honour to finish what he has begun. He says he should not fear the ridicule or blame that would be thrown upon him by his countrymen for quitting his country at his age, but that he should despise himself if he abandoned his duty for any passion. This is all very reasonable, but reasonable for him only, not for me; and I have never felt anything for him but esteem and gratitude."

Mrs. Edgeworth, the intimate friend as well as the biographer of her step-daughter, writing of this affair many years later, observes:

Maria Edgeworth

“ Maria was mistaken as to her own feelings. She refused M. Edelcrantz, but she felt much more for him than esteem and admiration; she was exceedingly in love with him. Mr. Edgeworth left her to decide for herself; but she saw too plainly what it would be to us to lose her, and what she would feel at parting from us. She decided rightly for her own future happiness and for that of her family, but she suffered much at the time and long afterwards. . . . From what I saw of M. Edelcrantz, I think he was a man capable of really valuing her. I believe he was much attached to her, and deeply mortified at her refusal. He continued to reside in Sweden after the abdication of his master, and was always distinguished for his high character and great abilities. He never married. . . .

“ By what accident it happened that Maria had, long before she saw the Chevalier Edelcrantz, chosen Sweden for the scene of ‘The Knapsack,’ I do not know, but I remember his expressing his admiration of that beautiful little piece, and his pleasure in the fine characters of the Swedish gentlemen and peasants.”

CHAPTER V

PARISIAN GAIETIES

CHARLOTTE EDGEWORTH writes, on December 10, to one of her aunts:

“ I will introduce you to our company last night at the Delesserts’. All soirées here begin at nine o’clock.

“ Madame Edgeworth is announced—room full without being crowded—enough light and warmth. M. Delessert père at a card-table with a gentleman who is a partner in his bank, and an elderly lady. There is a warm corner in the room, which is always large enough to contain Madame Delessert and two or three ladies and gentlemen. Madame Delessert advances to receive Madame Edgeworth, and invites her to sit beside her with many kind words and looks. Madame Gautier expresses her joy at seeing us.

“ Now we are seated. M. Benjamin Delessert advances with his bow to the ladies. Madame Gautier, my father, and Maria get together. M. Pictet, nephew to our dear Pictet, makes his bow and adds a few words to each. . . . Madame Grivel enters, a clever, good-natured little woman, wife to the partner who is at cards. Enter M. François Delessert and another gentleman. How the company divides and changes itself I am not at present supposed to know, for young M. Pictet has seated himself between my mother and me, and has a long conversation with me, in which Madame Grivel now and then joins; Mademoiselle Lullin, our friend Pictet's sister, his and her virtues are discussed; physics and metaphysics ensue; harmony, astonishing power of chords in music, glass broken by vibration, dreams, Spain, its manners and government. Young M. Pictet has been there: people there have little to do because their wants are easily supplied.

Maria Edgeworth

“Here come tea and cakes, sweetmeats, grapes, cream, and all the goods of life. The lady who was playing at cards now came and sat beside me, amusing me for a long time with a conversation on—what do you think? Politics and the state of France! M. François repeats some good lines very well. Laughter and merriment. Now we are obliged to go, and with much sorrow we part.”

Miss Edgeworth writes: “We were a few days ago at a Bal d'Enfants; this you would translate ‘a children's ball,’ and so did we, till we were set right by the learned—not a single child was at the ball, and only half a dozen unmarried ladies: it is a ball given by mothers to their grown-up children. Charlotte appeared as usual to great advantage, and was much admired for her ease and unaffected manners. She danced one English country-dance with M. de Crillon, son of the Gibraltar Duke. When she stood up a gentleman came to me and exclaimed, 'Ah, mademoiselle, votre sœur va danser, nous attendons le moment où elle va paraître!' She appeared extremely well from not being anxious to appear at all."

CHARLOTTE EDGEWORTH

Parisian Gaieties

"One evening," we are told, "a fashionable young man had been introduced to Charlotte, and was standing talking to her. She observed him, while he talked, giving little puffs at the floor, till at last, having blown all the dust away, down he dropped upon one knee. 'Voulez-vous danser, mademoiselle?'"

We fancy we see Charlotte, as she joined the dance, dressed in the classical fashion of that day; her closely clinging muslin gown, with its short waist and its skirt just reaching to the ankles; her hair dressed in a knot behind, and bound with a ribbon or a string of beads.

The narrow, clinging skirts had just come into vogue. Some ladies, we are told, actually damped their drapery to make it cling the closer. A fine lady in one of Miss Edgeworth's novels of this period, making her entrance into an artificial pagoda at a grand gala, remarks: "None but belles without petticoats can enter here; fortunately I have but two, and Lady Langdale has but one."

Maria Edgeworth

It was in this same year (1802) that Fanny Burney (now Mme. d'Arblay) left England to settle with her husband and child in Paris. She describes, humorously, in her Diaries a French dressmaker's examination of her plain English attire.

"' This won't do!' exclaimed the modiste. ' That you can never wear! This you can never be seen in! That would make you stared at as a curiosity!—Three petticoats! No one wears more than one!—Stays? Everybody has left off even corsets!—Shift-sleeves? Not a soul now wears even a chemise!' &c. &c. In short, . . . hopeless of success in exhibiting myself in the costume français, I gave over the attempt and ventured to come forth as a Gothic Anglaise who had never heard of, or never heeded, the reigning metamorphoses."

Another Englishwoman of note was visiting Paris at this time—Miss Berry. Writing of the fashions of the day as seen at a grand ball, she says: "The women were in general well dressed, all coiffées en cheveux with flowers, and all the young ones dressed in white trimmed with bunches of flowers. . . . Vestris was there; danced a quadrille which was composed of the very best dancers of society. . . . Vestris' figure was curious; his coiffure was one of those bristling, frizzed and powdered heads that were worn about twenty years ago, and in dancing showers of powder came out of it, and it flapped up and down in the most ridiculous manner. He is still marvellous [however] and has movements that nobody else ever had. All the other men wore crops."

Parisian Gaieties

Powder, as we see, was thus going out of fashion, but rouge was still used. Miss Berry writes: "Went to Mdlle. Martin's to buy rouge. I thought from having heard all my life of the fame of Mdlle. Martin's rouge, that her receipt must, by this time, have descended to her great-grandchildren, mais point du tout. The original Mdlle. Martin herself, now a large, fat, old woman, with a very intelligent countenance, served us. She was dressed in a large bonnet, long powdered hair, the costume of twenty years ago."

Another English visitor, of whom we have already spoken—Mr. Sutton Sharpe (the elder)—endeavours to describe, from a man's point of view, the ladies' mode of dressing their hair. "The universal Fashion at present," he writes, "is to let the hair grow very long in front, and to let it hang over the forehead and cheeks in many curls or ringlets; each of these consisting of not more hairs than amount to the thickness of a piece of very thin pack-thread. The ringlets are not absolutely unbecoming, but far from elegant. After a little while they lose their curl and give a very blousy appearance to the heads. . . . The ornament most fashionable and tasteful for the hair is a comb with a broad richly ornamented back.”

Maria Edgeworth

BALCONY ON A CORNER HOUSE OF THE RUE DE LILLE

Mrs. Edgeworth, writing to a relative on November 21, says: “Has Maria told you that she has had her “Belinda” translated into French, by the young Count de Ségur, an amiable young man of one of the most ancient families of France, married to a granddaughter of the Chancellor d'Aguesseau?"

Parisian Gaieties

And Maria, herself, writes after meeting the father and mother of the young Count: "She is a beautiful grandmother, he a nobleman of the old school, who adds to agreeable manners a great deal of elegant literature." She goes on to mention Malouet, the amiable and able counsellor of the King. "We met him yesterday," she says; "a fine countenance and simple manners; he conversed freely with my father, not at all afraid of committing himself."

Mr. Edgeworth writes: "At Madame de Pastoret's we met M. Degerando and M. Camille Jordan. Not Camille Jourdan, the assassin, nor Camille Desmoulins, another assassin, nor General Jourdan, another assassin, but a young man of agreeable manners, gentle disposition and much information; he lives near Paris with his Pylades Degerando, who is also a man of much information. . . . Camille Jordan has written an admirably eloquent pamphlet on the choice of Buonaparte as first Consul for life; it was at first forbidden, but the Government wisely recollected that to forbid it is to excite curiosity. . . . M. de Prony, who is at the head of the Engineers des Ponts et Chaussées, was introduced to us by Mr. Watt."

"The title of philosopher," remarks Miss Edgeworth, "or rather of a man of letters or science, is the best possible title here. We see the French savants mixing with most polite and elegant societies of both sexes; not only without being considered as heterogeneous beings, but as essential to the formation of good company."

Maria Edgeworth

Mr. Edgeworth speaks in one of his letters of their meeting the Abbé Morellet's niece, who had come many leagues to see them; also of their meeting Mme. de Vergennes, Mme. de Rémusat, and Mme. de Nansouty, "all people of knowledge and charming manners."

Mme. de Vergennes was the mother of both Mme. de Rémusat and Mme. de Nansouty. Mme. de Rémusat in her interesting Mémoires describes the charm of her mother's conversation. "I fancy I see her," she writes, "seated in the midst of us, busily engaged upon some piece of needlework for one of her daughters, enlivening our evenings by her talk, always piquant and full of variety; recounting a thousand amusing stories, in her own original way, or, on the other hand, animating the society [of her salon] by the discussion of some serious subject; in which, amidst a stream of bright and racy remarks, there shone forth, at times, reflexions of a truly profound nature, reflexions which, however, her native tact inspired her to clothe with une sorte de couleur féminine."

Mme. de Rémusat inherited, it seems, the more serious and philosophic side of her mother's character, while Mme. de Nansouty was endowed with her gifts of imagination. These found a vent in her published poems.

Parisian Gaieties

Mrs. Edgeworth, writing in later years of Maria's intercourse with their interesting French friends, says: "She spoke French with so much ease and spirit, that her powers appeared as brilliant as if she was using her native language. One night when she had been very entertaining on turns of French expression . . . a lady exclaimed, 'Elle fait des calembours dans notre langue!'"

It might, indeed, have been remarked of Miss Edgeworth, as it was of a witty fellow-countryman of hers about to visit Paris at this same time, "Vous êtes fait pour plaire dans un salon français. Sans cesser d'être naturel vous serez très singulier et très original, ce qui est le suprême mérite pour une nation qui ne craint que le bâillement."

"Several of the old aristocracy," continues Mrs. Edgeworth, "were charmed by Maria's knowledge of old French classic literature, which brought out all their own best powers of conversation, and opened their hearts to tell her much of their adventures and misfortunes in the revolutionary days. Her ready sympathy and real interest . . . in what she was listening to, formed one of her special charms to those who were first struck by her wit and genius—it surprised French talkers to find her so able a listener."

Maria Edgeworth

In all her letters from Paris Maria dwells upon her happy intercourse with her intellectual friends, and certainly these were among the élite of Parisian society, but it is in individuals of less high endowments that amusing national characteristics appear; and Miss Edgeworth shows in her published works how closely she had studied such personages in France as well as in England and Ireland.

The patient and lovable Emilie de Coulanges, in the story that bears her name, like the de Pastorets and Delesserts, might have belonged to any nation, but her mother, the Comtesse de Coulanges, and their benefactress, Mrs. Somers, could not possibly be other than French and English. How characteristic of their nationalities are their quarrels and discussions! How Mrs. Somers fumes and frets as if under personal insult when Mme. la Comtesse ranks Racine far above "that bloody-minded barbarian Shakespeare"! How the Comtesse, "after pleading the cause of Racine, as if it were a matter of life and death, as if the fate of Europe or the universe depended upon it, would turn to discuss the merits of a riband with equal vehemence, or coolly observe that she was hoarse, and that she would quit Racine for a better thing—de l'eau sucrée"!

The Comtesse de Coulanges, however, with all her pride and her frivolities, is a lady of high breeding; in the tale of "Mdlle. Panache" we have a vulgar Frenchwoman who imposes upon an English "fine lady," and becomes governess and companion to her daughter. The hero of the tale, a young Mr. Montague, calls the morning after a ball to pay his respects to this mother and daughter.

Parisian Gaieties

"No one was ready for breakfast on his arrival, and he spent an hour alone in the breakfast-room. At length the silence was interrupted by a shrill female voice, which, as it approached nearer, he perceived to be the voice of a foreigner, half suffocated with ineffectual desire to make her anger intelligible. He could only distinguish the words, 'I ring, ring, ring, ay, twenty time, and nobody mind my bell nor me more dan noting at all.' With a violent push the breakfast-room door flew open, and Mdlle. Panache, little expecting to find anybody there, entered volubly, repeating, 'Dey let me ring, ring, ring!'

"Surprised at the sight of a gentleman, and a young gentleman, she repented having been so loud in her anger." However, she supposes that he may be merely an apothecary who had been sent for, and therefore remarks, "Miladi is not visible yet, sir. Does she know are you here?"

"I hope not, ma'am; for I should be very sorry that she were to be disturbed, after sitting up so late last night."

"O dat will do her no harm, for I gave her,

Maria Edgeworth

pardonnez, some excellent white wine whey out of my own head last night when she got into her bed. I hope you don't make no objections to white wine whey, sir?"

"I?—not in the least, ma'am."

This talk at cross-purposes continues till the family and their guests enter the room, when Mdlle. Panache, joining in the conversation, exclaims, "Je n'aime pas les prudes, moi."

"Dignité? Oh, I don't say noting against dignité, neider; not but I tink de English reserve is de trop. I tink a lady of a certain rank has always good principes enough to be sure, and as to the rest, qu'importe?—dat's my notions."

CHAPTER VI

THE GRAND REVIEW

MRS. EDGEWORTH says in one of her letters: "We paid a short visit to the pictures and saw the Salle du Tribunat and the Consul's apartments at the Tuileries; on the dressing-table there were the busts of Fox and Nelson."

Miss Berry also visited the Consul's apartments a few months earlier. After observing that they were not usually shown to the public, she remarks: "It is well they are not. Republican simplicity might well be excused for being startled at such magnificence. I have formerly seen Versailles, and I have seen the Little Trianon, and I have seen many palaces in other countries, but I never saw anything surpassing the magnificence of this."

Miss Berry gives a detailed description of the costly inlaid furniture and rich hangings of the various rooms. "In a salon hung with blue-lilac lustring embroidered in the honeysuckle pattern," she says, "is the beautiful St. Cecilia with a turban, playing upon the harp, by Domenichino—I think—taken from the Borghese Palace.” She also mentions numerous silken-draped mirrors, beneath which stood porphyry and other fine marble tables, bearing magnificent Sèvres vases and elegant candelabra.

Maria Edgeworth

Maria Edgeworth writes in December (1802): “We saw the grand Review the day before yesterday from a window that looked out on the court of the Louvre and Place du Carrousel. Buonaparte rode down the lines on a fine white Spanish horse. Took off his hat to salute various generals, and gave us a full view of his pale, thin, woebegone countenance. He is very little, but much at ease on horseback: it is said he never appears to so much advantage as on horseback. There were about six thousand troops, a fine show, well appointed, and some, but not all, well mounted. On those who had distinguished themselves in the battle of Marengo all eyes were fixed.”

Madame d’Arblay, who also witnessed a review in the Place du Carrousel a few months earlier, writes:

“Buonaparte, mounting a beautiful and spirited white horse, closely encircled by his glittering aides-de-camp, and accompanied by his generals, rode round the ranks, holding his bridle indifferently in either hand, and seeming utterly careless of the prancing, rearing, or other freaks of his horse, insomuch as to strike some who were near me with a notion of his being a bad horse-man. I am the last to be a judge, upon this subject; but as a remarker, he only appeared to me a man who knew so well he could manage the animal when he pleased, that he did not deem it worth his while to keep constantly in order what he knew, if urged or provoked, he could subdue in a moment.

Memoir

NAPOLÉON

The Grand Review

“Precisely opposite to the window at which I was placed the Chief Consul stationed himself after making his round; and thence he presented some swords of honour, spreading out one arm with an air . . . that was highly military and commanding. Just as the consular band, with their brazen drums, as well as trumpets, marched facing the First Consul, the sun broke suddenly out from the clouds which had obscured it all the morning; and the effect was so abrupt and so dazzling that I could not help observing it to my [neighbour], who, eyeing me with great surprise, not unmixed with the compassion of contempt, said:

“‘Est-ce que vous ne savez pas cela, madame? Dès que le Premier Consul vient à la parade, le soleil vient aussi!’

“I apologised for my ignorance; but doubt whether it was forgiven.”

To return to Miss Edgeworth’s narrative. “Mr. Knox,” she writes, “who was presented to Buonaparte, and who saw all the wonderful presentations, says that it was a muddled business, all the world received in a very small room. Buonaparte spoke more to officers than to any one else. [He] affected to be gracious to the English, [and] said, 'L'Angleterre est une grande nation, aussi bien que la France, il faut que nous soyons amis!' Great men's words, like little men's dreams, are sometimes to be interpreted by the rule of contraries."

Maria Edgeworth

Charlotte Edgeworth, writing home on December 8, remarks: "The Review is, as you see by the papers, over, and my father has not spoken to the great man—no, he did not wish it. All our distant friends will be, I am afraid, disappointed; but some here think that my father's refusal to be presented to him shows a proper pride. All the reasons for this mode of conduct will serve perhaps for debate, certainly for conversation when we return."

The hopes of the Liberal party in England, to which the Edgeworths as a family belonged, had been high when Buonaparte first began his career and posed as the liberator of all the nations that were suffering from tyranny and oppression, but a nearer view of his personal character and methods of government had undeceived Mr. Edgeworth; hence his determination not to pay court to him.

Among the Edgeworth MSS. there is a letter from a Mr. Merry, secretary to Lord Whitworth,

The Grand Review

the English Ambassador, dated December 3, 1802, proposing to take measures for Mr. Edgeworth's presentation to the First Consul; also Mr. Edgeworth's letter in reply.

The latter runs as follows :

“Mr. Edgeworth presents his compliments to Mr. Merry. He is flattered and obliged by Mr. M.'s attentions.

“The wish of being introduced to the First Consul upon his arrival at Paris has since that time so far subsided that he will not give Mr. Merry any further trouble on that subject.

“Dec. 3.”

“On the 27th January”* (1803), writes Mrs. Edgeworth, “Mr. Edgeworth received a peremptory order from the French Government to quit Paris immediately. He went with Maria to the village of Passy. Our friend Madame Gautier generously offered to him the use of her house there, but he would not compromise her. M. de Pastoret and M. Delessert visited him the next morning, fearless of Buonaparte and his orders.”

The official document containing this command of banishment still exists among the Edgeworth

* This date should have been the 22nd. It is probably a printer's error.

Maria Edgeworth

relics, and is at the present time in our hands. In it Mr. Edgeworth is enjoined to quit Paris in twenty-four hours and France within a fortnight. The document bears the insignia of the Republic, and is dated "Paris, le premier Pluviose, an onze de la République."

Lord Whitworth, in his despatches to the British Government, gives a detailed account of this "act of rigour perpetrated by the First Consul against one of his Majesty's subjects," and says he has written to M. de Talleyrand for an explanation. In the meantime, he says he has learnt that "Mr. Edgeworth had discovered that the crime of which he was accused was that of being brother to the Abbé Edgeworth, that respectable ecclesiastic who attended Louis XVI. in his last moments."

Mr. Edgeworth was not the brother, but only a cousin of the Abbé's; but he informed Lord Whitworth that he "would never deny or give up the honour of being related to him." Mr. Edgeworth was then required by the Consular authorities to send in a humble petition to the First Consul for his release from banishment, stating at the same time his exact relationship to the Abbé. This he refused to do; "but he is ready," writes the Ambassador, "to sign a declaration [of the relationship], and this I have no doubt will be sufficient to procure his return, since they must be ashamed of so unprovoked an act of violence."

The Grand Review

This proved to be the case, and Mr. Edgeworth, accompanied by his friends, M. Pictet and M. Le Breton, who had brought him the news of the remission of his sentence, returned to Paris.

CHAPTER VII

PENELOPE AND CALYPSO

THE following letter of Miss Edgeworth's was written to her aunt Miss Mary Sneyd shortly before the events just recorded took place:

“PARIS, Jan. 10th, 1803.

“Siècle réparateur, as Monge has christened this century.

“I will give you a journal of yesterday; I know you love journals. Got up and put on our shoes and stockings and cambric muslin gowns, which are in high esteem here, fur tippets and fur-clogs—God bless Aunt Mary and Aunt Charlotte for them—and were in coach by nine o'clock. Drove to the excellent Abbé Morellet's, where we were invited to breakfast to meet Madame d'Ouditot,* the lady who inspired Rousseau with the idea of Julie.†

“Julie is now seventy-two years of age, a thin woman in a little black bonnet. She appeared to me shockingly ugly; she squints so much that it is impossible to tell which way she is looking; but no sooner did I hear her speak than I began to like her, and no sooner was I seated beside her than I began to find in her countenance a most benevolent and agreeable expression. She entered into conversation immediately; her manner invited and could not fail to obtain confidence. She seems as gay and open-hearted as a girl of fifteen. . . . She is possessed of that art which Lord Kaimes said he would prefer to the finest gift from the queen of the fairies—the art of seizing the best side of every object. She has had great misfortunes, but she has still retained the power of making herself and her friends happy. Even during the horrors of the Revolution, if she met with a flower, a butterfly, an agreeable smell, a pretty colour, she would turn her attention to these, and for the moment suspend her sense of misery, not from frivolity, but from real philosophy. No one has exerted themselves with more energy in the service of their friends. I felt in her company the delightful influence of a cheerful temper and soft, attractive manners—enthusiasm which age cannot extinguish, and which spends, but does not waste itself, on small but not trifling objects.”

* This name is usually spelt d'Houditot.

† The heroine in the “Nouvelle Héloïse.”

Penelope and Calypso

This description of Mme. d’Houditot is in keeping with all that we read of her.

Her cousin and contemporary, Mme. d’Epinay,

Maria Edgeworth

writing of her in her youth, exclaims: "Oh, what a lovely soul is hers, so naïve, so sensible, so honest!" And a writer of our own time speaks of her "perennial freshness of feeling that never changed," and of "that winning charm of la jeunesse morale which caused her to be loved throughout the whole course of her life."

Rousseau, addressing his Julie in the "Nouvelle Héloïse," writes: "It is this touching combination of keen sensibility with an unchanging sweetness of disposition, this tender pity for the sorrows of others, this rectitude of mind united with an exquisite taste for all that is lovely, whose pure source lies deep within the soul; in one word, it is the charms of mind and of heart rather than those of the outward form that I worship in you. I admit that it is possible to imagine you more beautiful than you are, but more lovable, more worthy the heart of a good man, no, Julie, that is impossible!"

Rousseau's love for the original of "Julie," tempered as it was by his veneration for her character, is described by him in his "Confessions" as "le premier et l'unique en toute ma vie."

"Once at a dinner at Mme. d'Ouditot's," writes Miss Edgeworth, "there was a fine pyramid of fruit. Rousseau, in helping himself, took the peach which formed the base of the pyramid, and the rest fell immediately. 'Rousseau,' said she,

Penelope and Calypso

‘that is what you always do with all our systems: you pull down with a single touch, but who will build up what you pull down?’”

Mrs. Edgeworth writes on February 22: “Last Thursday, jeudi gras, we dined at two, and were at St. Germain at six, at Madame Campan’s, where we had been invited to see some plays acted by her pupils. The little theatre appeared already full when we entered. We stood a few seconds near the door, when Madame Campan cried out from above: ‘Placez Madame Edgeworth, faites monter Madame et sa compagnie.’ So we went up to the gallery, where we had very good places next to a Polish Princess and half a dozen of her countrywomen, who are all polite and well-bred. The crowd increased, many more than there was room for. The famous Madame Visconti and Lady Yarmouth sat behind us, Lady Elizabeth Foster and Lady Bessborough not far from us, and below, [among] a number of English, the Duchess of Gordon and her beautiful daughter, Lady Georgiana. Madame Louis Buonaparte, who had been one of Madame Campan’s élèves, was the principal Frenchwoman.”

This lady, known as Hortense de Beauharnais, daughter of Josephine by her first husband, had been recently married to the First Consul’s brother, Louis. She was then nineteen years of age. “Her face,” we are told, “framed in her fair curling hair, had the freshness of a flower." In character she was both gentle and gay; "parfaitement bonne," a friend describes her.

Maria Edgeworth

Maria herself continues the description of the dramatic entertainment in a letter addressed to her aunt Miss Mary Sneyd, "The play was Racine's Esther," she writes, "and it interested me the next day to read Madame de Sévigné's account of its representation by the young ladies of St. Cyr, under the patronage of Madame de Maintenon."

This performance took place in the month of February 1689. "The drama," writes Mme. de Sévigné, "consists of a combination of [instrumental] music, of poetry, of songs and of characters so perfect and so complete that nothing is left to the imagination to desire. . . . All is simple, all is innocent, all is alike sublime and touching."

"Madame de Genlis's beautiful Rosière de Salency," proceeds Miss Edgeworth, "was acted after Esther, and the scene where the mother denounces her daughter and pushes her from her, was so admirably written and so admirably played, that it made me forget the stage, the actors, and the spectators—I could not help thinking it real.

"Full of the pleasure I had received from the Rosière de Salency," continues the writer, "I was impatient to pay a visit to Madame de Genlis, who had written to say she would be glad to be personally acquainted with Mr. and Miss Edgeworth. She lives—where do you think?—where Sully used to live at the Arsenal. Buonaparte has given her apartments there.”

Penelope and Calypso

The Arsenal stands, as the reader may remember, beyond the Place de la Bastille, an ill-lighted and dreary region in 1803. Its vast buildings are divided by innumerable court-yards, and it was long before the Edgeworths could discover the block in which were the apartments of Mme. de Genlis. At last a surly porter, candle in hand, led the way up a dark staircase, and, pointing to a recess, exclaimed, “Allez, voilà la porte, et tirez la sonnette.” “He and his candle went down,” writes Maria, “and my father had but just time to seize the handle of the bell when we were again in darkness. Presently footsteps were heard approaching, and the door was opened by a young girl who held a wavering candle in her hand. . . . After surveying us, and hearing that our name was Edgeworth, she smiled graciously, and bid us follow her, saying, ‘Maman est chez elle.’

“She led us into a small room, in which the candles were so well screened by a green tin screen that we could scarcely distinguish the tall form of a lady in black, who rose from her arm-chair by the fireside as the door opened: a great puff of smoke issuing from the huge fireplace at the same moment. She came forward, and we made our way towards her as well as we could, through a confusion of tables, chairs and work-baskets, china, writing-desks and ink-stands, bird-cages and a harp. She did not speak, and as her back was now turned to both fire and candle, I could not see her face, or anything but the outline of her form, and her attitude; her form was the remains of a fine form, and her attitude that of a woman used to a better drawing-room. I, being foremost, and she silent, was compelled to speak to this figure in darkness . . . she replied by taking my hand and saying something in which charmée was the most intelligible word. Whilst she spoke she looked over my shoulder at my father, whose bow I presume told her he was a gentleman, for she spoke to him immediately as if she wished to please, and seated us in fauteuils near the fire.

Maria Edgeworth

“I then had a full view of her face and figure: . . . dark eyes, long sallow cheeks, compressed thin lips, two or three black ringlets on a high forehead . . . altogether an appearance of fallen fortunes, worn-out health, and excessive but guarded irritability. To me there was nothing of that engaging, captivating manner which I had been taught to expect by many even of her enemies; she seemed to me to be alive only to literary quarrels and jealousies; the muscles of her face as she spoke, or as my father spoke to her, quickly and too easily expressed hatred and anger whenever any not of her own party were mentioned. . . .

Penelope and Calypso

“She spoke of Madame de Staël’s ‘Delphine’ with detestation, of another new and fashionable novel, ‘Amélie,’ with abhorrence, and kissed my forehead twice because I had not read it. ‘Vous autres Anglaises vous êtes modestes!’ Where was Madame de Genlis’s sense of delicacy when she penned and published ‘Les Chevaliers du Cygne’? Forgive me, my dear Aunt Mary,” continues Maria; “you begged me to see her with favourable eyes, and I went . . . with the most favourable disposition, but I could not like her; there was something of malignity in her countenance and conversation that repelled love, and of hypocrisy which annihilated esteem, and from time to time I saw, or thought I saw, through the gloom of her countenance a gleam of coquetry. . . . I never met any one of any party who was her friend; this strikes me with real melancholy; to see a woman of the first talents in Europe, who lived and has shone in the gay court of the gayest nation in the world, now deserted and forlorn . . . without society, without a single friend, admired—and despised.”

Perhaps it may interest the reader to learn that Mme. d’Arbly’s opinion of Mme. de Genlis coincided with that of Miss Edgeworth.

At the foot of an effusive letter addressed to her (as Fanny Burney) by this lady in July 1785,

Maria Edgeworth

Mme. d'Arblay wrote in later years the following words:

“N.B.—This note is from the celebrated Mme. la Cesse. de Genlis, written upon her first visit to England, when, warmly and with predetermined partiality, she sought the acquaintance and friendship of F. B., and she obtained them with the most ardent admiration of her talents and a zest yet greater for her engaging society and elegantly lively and winning manners—mais hélas! après! après! . . . In France F. d'A. was compelled to keep aloof—tho' most reluctantly.”

CHAPTER VIII

A FLIGHT

WHILE the events recorded by Miss Edgeworth in her last two letters were taking place ominous rumours were becoming prevalent of war breaking out afresh with England. Buonaparte's power on the Continent had been rapidly increasing and he knew well that England was the sole bar to his ambitious schemes. He had already, upon various pretexts, annexed both Piedmont and the Duchy of Parma to France; he had overthrown the constitution of Switzerland, and now reigned supreme there under the title of "Mediator"; while, contrary to the express conditions of the Treaty of Amiens, his troops still occupied Holland.

It soon became known in England that the building of French warships was being carried on to a large extent. They were nominally designed for the protection of the French colonies; but George III., in a message to Parliament, sent early in March, adverted to the necessity of our being prepared for an attack, and it was resolved to call out the Militia and augment the naval force. A report of this message excited the high indignation of the First Consul.

Maria Edgeworth

Lord Whitworth, in a despatch to Lord Hawkesbury, writes:

“At the Court which was held at the Tuileries (yesterday), and the which I attended, the First Consul accosted me evidently under very considerable agitation. He began by asking me if I had any news from England. I told him that I had received letters from your Lordship two days ago. He immediately said, ‘So you are determined to go to war?’

“‘No, Premier Consul,’ I replied, ‘we are too sensible of the advantages of peace.’

“‘Nous avons déjà fait la guerre pendant quinze ans.’

“As he seemed to wait for an answer, I observed only, ‘C’en est déjà trop.’

“‘Mais,’ said he, ‘vous voulez la faire encore quinze années et vous m’y forcez.’

“I told him that was very far from his Majesty’s intentions. He then proceeded to Count Marcaff and the Chevalier d’Azzara, who were standing together at a little distance from me, and said to them: ‘Les Anglais veulent la guerre, mais s’ils sont les premiers à tirer l’épée, je serai le dernier à la remettre. Ils ne respectent pas les traités. . . .’

Thos. Lawrence

LORD WHITWORTH

A Flight

Malheur a ceux qui ne respectent pas les traités !
Ils en sont responsables à toute l'Europe !'

"He was too agitated to make it advisable to prolong the conversation. I therefore made no answer, and he retired to his apartment repeating the last phrase.

"It is to be remarked," continues Lord Whitworth, "that all this passed loud enough to be overheard by two hundred people who were present. I was fortunate enough," he adds, "not to be betrayed into anything imprudent, or which could be misconstrued. I am persuaded that there was not a single person who did not feel the extreme impropriety of his conduct and the total want of dignity, as well as of decency, on the occasion."

Even M. Thiers admits this in his grandiloquent description of the foregoing scene. "The eyes of Buonaparte," he remarks, "were flashing frightful as power when enraged, but destitute of the calm dignity which becomes it so well. He took a sort of pleasure in making the thunders of his wrath reverberate to the extremities of the earth."

To return to the Edgeworths.

The belief in an approaching war with England gaining ground, and many of their friends giving credence to this belief, Mr. Edgeworth considered it advisable for his family to quit Paris.

"He decided to set out immediately," writes

Maria Edgeworth

Mrs. Edgeworth, "and we began to pack up. Other friends contradicted this fear . . . and the hope that the rumours of war were unfounded, made us suspend our packing. M. Le Breton called, and said he was sure of knowing before that evening the truth as to Buonaparte's warlike intentions, and that if Mr. Edgeworth met him at a friend's that night, he would know by his suddenly putting on his hat that war was imminent. M. Le Breton was unable to visit us again, and afraid, if he wrote, that his letter might be intercepted. Still more was he afraid of being overheard if he said anything at the party where they were to meet.

"Mr. Edgeworth went [to the friend's house] and saw M. Le Breton, who did suddenly put on his hat, and on Mr. Edgeworth's return to us he said we must go.

"The next day was spent in taking leave of our kind friends, from whom we found it so painful to part, and who expressed so much regret at losing us, and so much doubt as to the probability of war that Mr. Edgeworth promised that if, on his arrival in London, his Paris friends wrote to say 'Peace,' he would return to them, and bring over the rest of his family from Ireland for a year's residence."

Maria writes to her aunt Mrs. Mary Sneyd on their arrival at Calais, on March 4: "At last, my dear Aunt Mary, we have actually left Paris.

A Flight

Perhaps we may be detained here for some days, as the wind is directly against us; but we have no reason to lament as we are in Grandsire's excellent house, and have books and thoughts enough to occupy us. Thoughts of friends from whom we have parted, and of friends to whom we are going. How few people in this world are so rich in friends!"

In a farewell letter to Mme. de Pastoret she says: "I am afraid that we return to our own country with too strong a taste for the elegance and facility of French society. We are not, I hope, by any means inclined to give ourselves travellers' airs; but without affectation we may sometimes be forced to make comparisons highly advantageous to the manners and politeness of our Parisian friends." *

The next letter is addressed to a relative:

"DOVER, March 6.

"All alive and merry: just landed after a fine passage of six hours."

Mrs. Edgeworth narrates:

"On our arrival in London we found the expected letter from M. Le Breton. It had been agreed that if there was to be peace, he was to conclude his letter with 'Mes hommages à la charmante Mademoiselle Charlotte'; if war, the charmante was to be omitted. He ended his letter, which made not the smallest allusion to politics or public events, with 'Mes hommages à Mademoiselle Charlotte,' and we set out for Edinburgh."

* From an unpublished letter in the possession of Mr. Bernard Quaritch.

Maria Edgeworth

CHAPTER IX

THE UPRISING OF A NATION

LORD WHITWORTH, in a despatch dated April 14 (1803) writes :

“It is certain that hitherto the First Consul has resisted everything and everybody ; but still those who have undertaken the task of reducing him to reason will not abandon it, and I think we may still hope.”

As time went on, however, the temper of Buonaparte, “for it was by that alone that he was influenced,” as the Ambassador remarks, did not improve. He was deaf to all arguments in favour of peace upon honourable terms for England, and on the evening of May 12 Lord Whitworth quitted the French capital. In his last despatch from Paris, written on that same evening at eight o’clock, he says :

“ I shall set off in half an hour ; and if they have any proposal to make they must send it after me. I confess I am not so sanguine. I shall in all probability be at Calais on Sunday, and I hope to find the packets ready to take me over immediately."

Maria Edgeworth

Lord Whitworth was not mistaken; no proposal came to delay his journey, and at the same time that he was embarking for Dover the French Ambassador, General Andréassy, who had quitted London, was embarking for Calais.

Thus England and France were once more at war with each other.

In the Times of May 30 (1803), we read :

"Accounts have been received in Town that the First Consul has issued a Decree ordering that all the English who are now in France above the age of eighteen (excepting females) shall be made prisoners-of-war. . . . Not fewer than 100 persons have been confined at Calais; among whom are Sir James Crawford, Mr. Cobourn, and Lord Yarmouth."

Morning Post, May 30.—"The English gentlemen in Paris have been sent to the Temple, the Conciergerie and the other prisons: the ladies have been sent to Fontainebleau. Mr. Talbot, Lord Whitworth's secretary, is among those who are under confinement; and all the effects, the rich furniture his Lordship left behind, are seized."

Times, May 31.—"The infamous measure in question is evidently the act of Buonaparte, and of Buonaparte only! There is not a Minister he has to consult, or rather to command, who could have advised it."

The Uprising of a Nation

A writer in the Morning Chronicle can hardly give credence to such arbitrary proceedings—proceedings which would "set at nought the sacred laws of hospitality, respected even by barbarians." "If," says he, "they have been committed, it must be manifest to all that the First Consul of France has survived his reason."

In the meantime extensive preparations were being made all along the northern coast of France for the invasion of England, a project which had taken a strong possession of the mind of Buonaparte. Mme. de Staël writes in her Dix Années d'Exile: "Flat-bottomed boats were ordered to be built from one end of France to the other. They were constructed in the forests on the borders of the great roads. . . . In Picardy a triumphal arch was erected, bearing these words: 'The road to London.'" "Let us be masters of the Channel for six hours," was Buonaparte's boast, "and we are masters of the world!"

At a grand military dinner given in Calais, at which the First Consul was present, the following toasts were drunk: "To the health of the first Quarter-master who shall quarter his troops at Dover," and "To the speedy review of the French Guards in St. James's Park."

The newspapers of the day reflect vividly the wide-spread feelings of indignation and of patriotism aroused by these proceedings. A writer in the Morning Post of July 4 says: "23,000 volunteers are actually embodied in Scotland, in battalions of from 300 to 800 men each, exclusive of cavalry. These occupy different parts of the coast which may be supposed the most vulnerable from Orkney to the Tweed."

Maria Edgeworth

"There are at this time in Devonshire," he continues, "sixteen complete troops of yeomanry cavalry, eight of which have been raised since the renewal of the war."

We read in the Mirror of the Times of July 23: "The Noblemen and Gentlemen of the metropolis have resolved to form themselves into a corps of cavalry, and to hold themselves in readiness to set off at an hour's notice to any part of the coast the enemy may attack."

Tidings of the enemy's movements was conveyed across country by means of the old signal-telegraph apparatus. Its wooden arms communicated the messages as they arrived from hill-top to hill-top until they finally reached the roof of the Admiralty at Whitehall.

In the Morning Chronicle of July 20 we read: "Yesterday a meeting of the Subscribers to Lloyd's Coffee-house took place, at which a splendid subscription was opened for granting relief to the relatives of those who may fall in the present contest. In a very short time upwards of £50,000 was subscribed."

The Uprising of a Nation

"At a meeting held at Greenwich for the establishment of a voluntary corps, a veteran General attended who had served before Quebec. He was brought to the assembly in a chair and made an harangue, concluding with an observation that, though he was now unable to wield his sword he could contribute his purse. He subscribed £50."

A writer in the St. James's Gazette of July 26 remarks: "The spirit of patriotism has risen in every part of the kingdom to a degree of enthusiasm altogether unparalleled. In the metropolis the theatres, the caricature-shops, the ballad-singers are all up in arms against the French Invasion and Buonaparte. Every piece of wall, where a placard can be posted up, exhibits a complete covering of loyal exhortations to the friends of Old England. The Exchange, the Bank, the counting-houses seem all filled with armed men. . . . Among a people so animated and so united, what is to be feared?"

A wise writer in the Morning Post gives a word of warning to those who may be over-confident.

"The exertions of the Government and of the people," he says, "cannot be too vigorous. The time is at hand when their strength will be put to the trial. . . . The Navy of England is the bravest and greatest that ever rode the ocean . . . but it cannot work miracles. Whatever depends on the winds and waves must be matter of chance. There is not, there never was, there never will be, there never can be, any safety for the people of England but in their own right arms. They are lost if they do not act as if there were a bridge from Calais to Dover. If there were, England could not be conquered unless her people were as base cowards as the Tyrant dares to call them.

Maria Edgeworth

“When a burning love of their country and a just, profound and permanent detestation of those who have sworn her destruction are kindled in every British heart, then the regular troops will only be our advanced guard. An armed nation full of the unconquerable enthusiasm of patriotic zeal, will be the main body. Then and not till then, will this empire be safe.”

CHAPTER X

A PRISONER-OF-WAR

MME. DE STAËL writes in her Dix Années d'Exile : "I was at Geneva living . . . in the society of the English when the news of the declaration of war reached us. The rumour immediately spread that the English travellers would all be made prisoners, but, as nothing similar had ever been heard of in the law of European nations, I gave no credit to it, and my security was nearly proving injurious to my friends. . . . Persons entirely unconnected with political affairs—some of them repairing to different universities for education, others to the South for the recovery of their health, were arrested . . . all to gratify the spleen of the tyrant against the invincible nation to which they belong."

Among these unfortunate English travellers was Mr. Edgeworth's eldest son Lovell, a young man of about twenty-five years of age who had been spending some weeks in Geneva. On the first rumours that war with England was imminent,

Maria Edgeworth

Mr. Edgeworth wrote to warn him of his danger, but the letter miscarried, and Lovell fell a victim to Buonaparte's Decree.

There is a letter among the Edgeworth MSS., written by Lovell upon his arrival at the Fortress of Verdun, whither he and some other prisoners from Geneva had been conducted. It is addressed to a gentleman named Phillips, and our researches have led to the discovery that this gentleman must have been Captain Molesworth Phillips, the brother-in-law of Mme. d'Arblay (Fanny Burney). He and his family, like Lovell, were travelling on the Continent at this time and were made prisoners; though Phillips ultimately obtained their liberty through the intervention of Talleyrand, who had received much hospitality from Phillips when an émigré during the Reign of Terror:

Lovell's letter is as follows:

“VERDUN, August 14, 1803. ]

“MY DEAR PHILLIPS,

“I have this morning received your kind letter from Stutgard for which I thank you a thousand times as it first gave me the account of the departure of Meagre Stone from Geneva. I hope I shall soon have a full account of the whole transaction. As I suppose you have no account of me, nor of my fellow-prisoners, I shall give you a short summary of our proceedings. After one of the most tedious journeys of eleven days, through a heat generally of 90°, we at last got to this abominable hole—never shall I forget the first view which we had of this place. We had gone through a very pleasing, fertile and picturesque country when suddenly on Wednesday the 3rd at seven o'clock in the evening we came to the top of a hill, and looked down upon the most dismal country you ever beheld. Below was a flat bog, through which crept the Meuse, more like a nasty ditch than a river. Beyond were uncultivated wilds as far as eye could reach, with scarcely a tree or a bush to be seen. From the bog rose a small hill on which we saw the Cathedral of Verdun. The greatest part of the town lies by the side of the river which divides into a thousand different branches and has the appearance of dykes and ditches, and makes the whole place one of the dampest you ever beheld. It seems as if the Genius of Ague had made this his residence. We entered the town under archways, over drawbridges, by bastions, in short the most tremendous fortifications you can conceive. We came in, however, singing God save the King. We stopt at the best Inn in the town, and such a best!! Completely filled with vermin; though good eating; and an excellent bottle of champain made us, for a while, forget our woes. We searched for lodgings and have found tolerable. Dendy and Maude live together in a large house which we call the Palace, and are as melancholy

LOVELL EDGEWORTH

A Prisoner-of-War

Maria Edgeworth

as people in palaces generally are. Mr. Percy has a small house built between the two ditches called the Cottage, as damp as it possibly can be. I was to have lived with him but I fear the damp and the expense; as I thought he would live on a dearer plan than I should. Old Packington has a small room, 6 feet square. His sole consolation is swearing, and drinking weak brandy and water. As for poor me, I have a small house with a little garden to it by the side of the river, where my sole amusement is in catching flies, and Williams in fishing for little animals which are called Perch in this country, that are about the length of one's finger. Such is our situation—no sort of society in the town. The Com<sup>r</sup> is an old gruff soldier with one arm who tells his mind pretty roundly, I like him, however, better than our Genevese scoundrel. He lets us walk out of the town, but what good does that do, for what can we go out for to see but the reeds shaken by the wind? There are two other English here that were sent from Lyons, but no others. We have had parties of sailors marching through from Calais and that coast to be sent to Metz or Luneville. We have the prospect of the most dreary winter in this damp d—d hole that can be conceived. Farewell, remember us to your Brother and believe me to remain “Yours sincerely,

“LOVELL EDGEWORTH.”

THE WATER-GATE, VERDUN

A Prisoner-of-War

The foregoing is the only letter extant that Lovell wrote from Verdun. But we are able to give the reader some account of the prisoners' life in that dreary place from another source.

Among the "parties of sailors" brought as prisoners-of-war to Verdun, there was a certain young midshipman named Edward Boys (afterwards Captain Boys, R.N.). It is from his "Narrative of a Captivity, Escape and Adventures," a true sailor's book, simple, sincere and full of humour, that we get a picture of that life.*

Boys had been serving on board H.M.S. Phæbe, which was on its way to join Nelson (then off the coast of Catalonia) when the ship had a skirmish with four French frigates off Toulon. The Phæbe escaped but Boys and two other midshipmen who had been sent out in boats with some sailors for a night attack, were captured and taken on board the Rhin, a French warship.

"The following day," writes Boys, "we were separately examined before officers, and our refusal to answer questions respecting the strength and situation of Lord Nelson, was construed into contempt, and so excited the rage of the captain of the Rhin that he told us we were pirates!"

This captain, Boys tells us, had formerly been a

* It was from this book, it seems, that Captain Marryatt took many of the adventures introduced into "Midshipman Easy."

Maria Edgeworth

barber and had obtained his command of a frigate during the Revolution. He was totally ignorant of the official position held by English midshipmen, but he was, at last, made to understand that they were acting under the orders of superior officers.

The writer describes vividly the hardships that he and his companions encountered during their long march across country to Verdun, where they were entirely at the mercy of brutal men who, like this "august barber" as Boys calls him, had been brought into prominence by the Revolution and who openly boasted of their grim deeds during the Reign of Terror.

At last, on the morning of January 21, 1804, the captives reached Verdun. "We were escorted to its citadel," writes Boys. . . . "I found about 400 English [in the place] and a constant influx [continued] for several days."

"The command of the détenus," he continues, "was entrusted to a man named Wirion, who had been an adroit police officer, but had risen during the Revolution to the rank of general of gendarmerie. No sooner had this man entered upon his new office, than he established a system of espionage in imitation of the police of the whole republic. It was computed that he had no less than fifty principal informers, on whom he could depend, and each of these had one or more subordinate reporters . . .

A Prisoner-of-War

many of them also employed the tradesmen, women and servants to collect their gleanings.

“Had Buonaparte carefully searched his army list, he could not have found two men less calculated to preside over a body of gentlemen than this General Wirion and the Commandant Courcelles ; the only distinction between them being that to the depravity of an unprincipled, rapacious tyrant, the latter added the malice and manners of a ruffian.”

A system of fines and enforced douceurs greatly reduced the small pay allotted to the prisoners ; while a gaming-table, in which the General had “a large share of the profits, was a constant allurements to iniquity for the unwary and inebriated.”

The privilege of ranging six miles from Verdun was obtained by payment of a douceur, the return to town being enjoined by the firing of a gun.

“Four of us were rambling about the country,” writes Boys, “with a pointer and a silken net, when the signal-gun was fired ; on our return, in passing through the village of Tierville, about two miles from Verdun, we were surprised by two gendarmes, one of whom instantly dismounted and seized me, uttering the most blasphemous epithets. He tied my elbows behind me, then slipping a noose round my neck, triced me up to the holsters of his saddle, remounted and returned with his prize to town, exulting in his cowardly triumph and every now and then tightening the cord so as to keep me trotting upon the extremity of the toes to obtain relief. Vain would be the attempt to convey an adequate idea of the impotent rage then boiling within me at the insult offered to my juvenile dignity.”

Maria Edgeworth

Boys' companions were treated in like fashion, and they were thus all four brought back to Verdun.

The officials, to whom the fate of the unhappy prisoners was entrusted, were indeed a vicious set of men, but Boys points out again and again that they were the outcome of the violent period of the Revolution, and says that his readers “must not form an opinion of French officers by them.” In 1809 he tells us General Wirion, whose conduct had become notorious, was summoned to Paris to undergo his trial, when, foreseeing the result, he shot himself. Two years later, the Commandant Courcelles, who was convicted of gross extortions, was dismissed the army. The greater number of their underlings also came to a shameful end, of which Boys furnishes the details.

In the year 1807 Boys had the good fortune to effect his escape from Verdun; and this he did by a sailor's stratagem, which avoided the breaking of his parole.

To return to Lovell Edgeworth.

In the month of August 1812, when the future seemed impenetrably dark to the poor captives (for no tidings of Napoleon's reverses ever reached their ears), we hear of a letter from Lovell having found its way to Edgeworthstown. Maria Edgeworth, writing on August 22 to her cousin Miss Ruxton, says: "I enclose a copy of Lovell's letter, which will give my dear aunt exquisite pleasure. His request to my father to pass him over, a prisoner and of precarious health, and to make his next brother [the] heir, shows that if he has suffered, he has, at least, had an opportunity of showing what he is. We shall do all we can to get at Talleyrand or some friend for his exchange."

A Prisoner-of-War

CHAPTER XI

TALES OF FASHIONABLE LIFE

MARIA EDGEWORTH writes from her Irish home on May 4, 1805, when she was recovering from an attack of illness: "We are a little, but very little, afraid of being swallowed up by the French: they have so much to swallow and digest before they come to us! They did come once very near to be sure, but they got nothing by it."

In this same letter she remarks: "Charlotte cordials me twice a day with "Cecilia," which she reads charmingly, and which entertains me as much at the third reading as it did at the first."

We hear of a "sort of masquerade" being enacted at Edgeworthstown a few months earlier, of which mention is made in the "Memoir" by Mrs. Edgeworth. Maria thus describes her own part.

"Miss E. Madame Duval, the old Frenchwoman in 'Evelina'; hair drawn up to a prodigious height, powdered and surmounted with scarlet flowers, feathers and trumpery of all sorts, the whole holding [on] by two pins, which she was in dread all night should be pulled out by Squire Richard, admirably played by William. He was at once noisy and countrified and as full of clownish, schoolboy practical jokes as Captain Mirvan himself, and once frightened 'Madame French' nearly into fits by throwing a whole collared eel to her at supper."

Tales of Fashionable Life

Mr. Edgeworth was in London during the early part of the summer of 1805. Maria writes on June 21 :

"I had a most pleasant long letter from my father to-day. He has become acquainted with Mrs. Crewe—'Buff and blue and Mrs. Crewe'—and gives an account of a déjeuner at her house at Hampstead as quite delightful. Miss Crewe charmed him by praising 'To-morrow,' and he claimed, he says, remuneration on the spot—a song—which it is not easy to obtain; she sang, and he thought her singing worthy of its celebrity. He was charmed with old Dr. Burney, who at eighty-two was the most lively, well-bred, agreeable man in the room. Lord Stanhope begged to be presented to him, and he thought him the most wonderful man he ever met."

Mrs. Crewe's "house at Hampstead," where this attractive company assembled, was known formerly as "Camelford Cottage." A portion of it only remains at the present time; part of the cottage having been taken down some years ago. Its long garden borders the West Heath, and its windows must have commanded fine views beyond the common of the undulating wooded country, with Harrow-on-the-Hill in the far distance.

Maria Edgeworth

Here Fanny Burney, the "modest authoress" of "Evelina" and of "Cecilia," used to come with her father in former days, to meet Edmund Burke, Erskine, and other celebrities.

In Maria Edgeworth's letters we have many a glimpse of well-known eighteenth-century folk. One day she meets Sir William Pepys—whose name so often occurs in Fanny Burney's "Diaries."

Here is a bon-mot of the "Queen of the Blues." "Mrs. Montagu," writes Maria, "once whispered to Sir William, on seeing a very awkward man coming into the room, 'There is a man who would give one of his hands to know what to do with the other!'"

During the period we have been writing of, Maria Edgeworth was working steadily at her "Tales of Fashionable Life," which were in fact novels, each complete in itself but of varying length. The first series was published in the month of June 1809, just two years before the advent of Jane Austen's first novel, and five years before the appearance of the first of Walter Scott's romances.

A long and favourable notice of the "Tales"

CAMELFORD COTTAGE

Tales of Fashionable Life

appeared in the Edinburgh Review of July, from the pen of Lord Jeffrey. The article opens with the following words:

“If it were possible for reviewers to envy the authors who are brought before them for judgment, we rather think we should be tempted to envy Miss Edgeworth: not, however, so much for her matchless powers of probable invention—her never-failing good sense and cheerfulness—nor her fine discrimination of characters; as for the delightful consciousness of having done more good than any other writer, male or female, of her generation. Other arts and sciences have their use no doubt, and heaven knows they have their reward and their fame, but the great art is the art of living; and the chief science, the science of being happy. . . . Miss Edgeworth is the great modern mistress in this school of true philosophy, and has eclipsed, we think, the fame of all her predecessors.”

M. Dumont wrote to Miss Edgeworth on the appearance of her new work:

“We have been reading ‘Tales of Fashionable Life’ in society—all society is in fact a little Theatre—‘Ennui’ and ‘Manœuvring’ have had a marked success. Much of the dialogue is humorous in the very best style—that is to say, dialogue in which the characters develop themselves unconsciously and are amusing without any idea that they are so.

Maria Edgeworth

“Fear no difficulties. It is in these that your powers shine!”

It was to M. Dumont (the apostle of Bentham) that Mme. de Staël is said to have remarked, in her trenchant way: “Vraiment Miss Edgeworth est digne de l’enthousiasme, mais elle se perd dans votre triste utilité.”

There is some truth in this criticism. Maria Edgeworth, we admit, insists too much, at times, upon the moral of the piece with the result that the reader is more attracted by the folly of the foolish than by the wisdom of the wise, and cannot help sympathising in the remark made by one of her characters: “We Irish is wonderful soon tired of goodness, if there’s no spice of fun along with it.” But this fault is much more observable in the early novels than in those of a later date, and in her best works does not exist at all.

In the summer of 1812 a second series of “Tales of Fashionable Life” made its appearance, and was again most favourably reviewed by Lord Jeffrey.

An advertisement of the work is to be found in a “List of New Publications” given in the Edinburgh Review of November of the same year under the heading of “Novels.” The entry is as follows: “Edgeworth’s ‘Tales of Fashionable Life,’ Vol. 4, 5, 6. 21s.”

Immediately below this entry comes the announcement, "‘Sense and Sensibility.’ By a Lady, three vols. 15s.,"* the first of Jane Austen’s novels given to the public.

J. Constable

HAMPSTEAD HEATH

Tales of Fashionable Life

It is pleasant to learn from their letters that the authors admired each other’s works, and that Maria Edgeworth truly appreciated the novel of "Persuasion."

The second series of "Tales of Fashionable Life" included the "Absentee"—a masterpiece—in which there is throughout the whole action a vigour and movement that carries the reader completely away. Yet to our surprise we learn that the greater part of this work was composed when Maria Edgeworth was suffering from severe toothache. "In spite of the torturing pain," says Mrs. Edgeworth, "she never wrote with more spirit and rapidity."

The chief personages of the story are Irish, and much of the scene is laid in Ireland, where the author is at all times especially strong, and where she has free scope for her racy humour.

But Miss Edgeworth, ever modest about her own productions, writes to a relative on the publication of this work: "I cannot by any form of words express how delighted I am . . . that my uncle and aunt are pleased with what they have read of 'The Absentee.' I long to hear whether this favour continues to the end and extends to the catastrophe, that dangerous rock upon which poor authors, even after a prosperous voyage, are wrecked, sometimes while their friends are actually hailing them from the shore."

* Facsimile given in "Jane Austen: Her Homes and her Friends."

Maria Edgeworth

In the year 1814, "Waverley," the first of Scott's novels, made its appearance; published, as is well known, anonymously and creating a great and widespread sensation. The work was read aloud amidst the assembled family at Edgeworthstown, and Maria listened with enthralled attention.

"Late at night, in all the first fervour of admiration, she wrote to the Great Unknown," says Mrs. Edgeworth. "As Mr. Edgeworth had exclaimed as I closed the volume 'Aut Scotus aut Diabolus,' Maria placed those words at the top of her letter. Before she finished it, I opened the book again and said, 'There is a postscript by way of a preface,' which rather unwillingly she stopped to hear."

What must have been Maria's surprise and delight when she heard the following words recorded by the author of "Waverley"?

"It has been my object to describe the persons [of this narrative] not by a caricatured and exaggerated use of the national dialect, but by their habits, manners, and feelings; so as, in some distant degree, to emulate the admirable Irish portraits drawn by Miss Edgeworth."

Tales of Fashionable Life

From this gallery of Irish portraits we should like to hold up some particular picture for the reader's inspection—but they are not single portraits but form groups in which every individual depicted assists by contrast or combination in making the completeness of all. .

Perhaps the reader may not be acquainted with a comedy by Miss Edgeworth, called Love and Law. We will, therefore, introduce him to two or three of its personages. These appear before a pompous magistrate of English race, who is utterly unable to cope with the excitable but quick-witted Celts whom he attempts to keep in order. Of these a hot-tempered but warm-hearted matron, Catty Rooney, is leader.

“Plase your honour will I speak now?” cries Catty, to the indignation of the officials in full court . . . “then I ixpect his honour will do me justice. I got a great character of his honour, I'd sooner come before your honour than any jantleman in all Ireland. I'm sure your honour will stand me friend.”

CLERK. Silence!

THE MAGISTRATE, MR. CARVER. Misguided people of Ballynavogue and Ballynascraw—when I consider and look round me, gentlemen, and when I look round me and consider, how long a period of time I have had the honour to bear his Majesty's commission for the peace for this county—

Maria Edgeworth

CATTY [curtsying]. Your honour's a good warrant no doubt.

MR. CARVER. Hem!—hem!—also being a residentiary gentleman at Bob's Fort—hem!—hem!—hem!— [Coughs and blows his nose.]

CATTY [aside to her son]. Choking the cratur is with the words he can't get out. [Aloud.] Will I spake now, plase your honour?

CLERK. Silence! Silence!

MR. CARVER. My good people of Ballynavogue and Ballynascraw, I stand here in unspeakable concern and astonishment, to notice at this fair in my barony, these symptoms of a riot, gentlemen, and features of a tumult.

CATTY. Them McBrides bred the riot entirely under Flourishing Phil, plase your honour.

MR. CARVER. Mr. Philip McBride, I am really concerned to see you, whom I looked upon as a sort of, I had almost said gentleman—

CATTY. Jantleman! what sort? Is it because of the new topped boots, or by virtue of the silver-topped whip, and the bit of red rag tied about the throat? Then a jantleman's asy made, nowadays.

PHILIP. It seems 'tis not so asy any way, to make a gentlewoman, Mrs. Rooney.

CATTY [springing forward angrily]. And is it me you mane, young man?

RANDAL. Oh! mother dear, don't be aggravating.

Tales of Fashionable Life

MR. CARVER. Clerk, why don't you maintain silence?

CATTY [pressing before her son]. Stand back, then, Randal Rooney—don't you hear silence?—don't be brawling before his honour. . . . I'll tell you how it was out o' the face, plase your honour, the whole Rooney faction——

MR. CARVER. Faction! No such word in my presence, madam.

CATTY. Oh, but I'm ready to swear it, plase your honour, in or out of the presence; the whole Rooney faction—every Rooney, big or little, that was in it, was bet, for no reason in life, by them McBrides there, them scum o' the earth.

MR. CARVER. Gently, gently, my good lady; no such thing in my presence as scum o' the earth.

CATTY. Well, Scotchmen if your honour prefers. But before a Scotchman, myself would prefer the poorest spalpeen.

CHAPTER XII

A WELCOME IN LONDON

MRS. BARBAULD, writing in the month of June 1814, remarks: "The three persons who have most engaged the attention of London societies [during the past year] have been women—Miss Edgeworth, Madame de Staël, and the Duchess of Oldenburg."

It was in May 1813 that Maria Edgeworth, in company with her father and step-mother, spent some weeks in London. They lodged at No. 10 Holles Street, a house which stands on the eastern side of the road near to Cavendish Square.

"The first persons who came to see us," writes Maria, "were Sir Humphry and Lady Davy, who have been uniformly kind and attentive to us. . . . We have been frequently at their dinners and parties and I should fill a roll as long as that genealogy Foot unrolled across the stage, if I were to give you a list of all the people we met at their house. Of Lord Byron I can tell you only that his appearance is nothing that you would remark."

NO. 10 HOLLES STREET

A Welcome in London

Mary Berry writes in her journal of May 12:

“I went to Lady Davy’s in the evening. There were seventy or eighty people there: amongst others Miss Edgeworth, who was my object. She is very small, with a countenance which promises nothing at first sight, or as one sees her in society.

“She has very winning manners. She received with much warmth what I said of my desire to see the author of her works, and of all the obligations that I felt, in common with all our sex, towards one of her genius. She said a great many pretty things of all she had heard of me, and of my society.”

The engaging qualities of the Miss Berrys have been made familiar to the world by Horace Walpole. As far back as 1788 he wrote on his first introduction to Mary Berry: “She is an angel inside and out.” In the same letter in which these words occur, he remarks to his correspondent, “I must even tell you they dress within the bounds of fashion, though fashionably; but without the excrescences and balconies with which the modern hoydens overwhelm and barricade their persons—in short, good sense, information, simplicity and ease characterise the Berrys. . . . The eldest,” he adds, “I discovered by chance, understands Latin, the younger draws charmingly.”

At this same period he addressed to them the

Maria Edgeworth

following stanzas which were printed by his own Strawberry Hill Printing Press :

To Mary's lips has ancient Rome
Her purest language taught,
And from this modern city home
Agnes its pencil brought.

Rome's ancient Horace sweetly chants
Such maids with lyric fire ;
Albion's old Horace sings nor paints—
He only can admire.

Still would his Press their fame record,
So amiable the Pair is ;
But, ah ! how vain to think his word
Can add a Straw to Berrys'.

Miss Edgeworth writes to a relative : “The Miss Berrys are all that you have heard of them from people of various tastes ; consequently you know that they are well bred and have nice tact in conversation.” And again she writes after mentioning various engagements, “called in the evening at Miss Berry's—quite like French society, most agreeable.”

The Miss Berrys were living at this time at No. 26 North Audley Street. Lord Houghton, one of the frequenters of their celebrated salon, tells us that “when Miss Berry called out ‘no more petticoats,’ Murrell, their servant, used to put out the lamp over the door, to prevent more carriage-loads of ladies coming in. A few habitués of the male sex, however, knew that they could still come in whether the lamp was out or not."

MARY BERRY

From a miniature painted by Mrs. Mee

A Welcome in London

In later years the sisters resided at No. 8 Curzon Street. "The day may be distant," writes Lord Houghton, "before social tradition forgets the house in Curzon Street where dwelt the Berrys," and "that modest room,

"Where none were sad and few were dull,
And each one said his best,
And beauty was most beautiful
With vanity at rest."

We have already had occasion to quote passages from Miss Berry's bright and graphic "Journals." It is pleasant to know that a large portion of them may now be enjoyed by the French nation, having been recently translated by Madame la Duchesse de Broglie (née Armaillé). They form a most attractive volume entitled "Voyages de Miss Berry à Paris, 1782-1836."

The salons of the Misses Berry, of Lady Davy and of Miss Lydia White were the most prominent in the London Society of 1813. They were carried on in the true French style—good conversation being their special attraction and refreshments kept within modest limits.

"Lydia White," writes Miss Edgeworth, "has been very kind to us, and eager to bring together people who would suit and please us; very agreeable dinner at her house. She conducts these bel esprit parties well; her vivacity breaks through the constraint of those who stand upon great reputations and are afraid of committing themselves."

Maria Edgeworth

Walter Scott writes of Miss White a few years earlier: "She is nineteen times dyed blue, lively and clever and absurd to the uttermost degree, but exceedingly good-natured."

After meeting Lady Crewe in society, Maria writes: "Lady Crewe has still the remains of beauty. Except her dress, which happened to be blue, there appeared to be nothing else blue about her. The contrast between her really fashionable air and manners and that of the strugglers and imitators struck me much. . . . Miss Fox is very agreeable—converses at once without preface or commonplace—Lady Charlotte Lindsay ditto."

Speaking again of Lady Charlotte Lindsay, in an unpublished letter, Maria remarks: "Her humour and good humour never failed to spread a radiance of pleasure over every circle the moment she appeared; and as she moved from place to place in a crowded party you could see by the radiance whereabouts she was.

"Miss Catherine Fanshaw," she continues, "I particularly like. She has delightful talents. Her drawings for the Bath Guide are full of humour and character."

Finishing her letter in haste the following morning, Maria remarks: "I have been standing in my dressing-gown and writing on the top of a chest of drawers, and now I must dress for a breakfast at Lady Davy's, where we are to meet Lord Byron."

A Welcome in London

This same breakfast is mentioned by Byron in a letter written some years later. "In 1813," he writes, "I recollect to have met them [the Edgeworths] in the fashionable world of London . . . in the assemblies of the hour, and at a breakfast of Sir Humphry and Lady Davy's, to which I was invited for the nonce. . . ."

"I thought Edgeworth a fine old fellow . . . active, brisk, and endless. He was seventy, but did not look fifty—no, nor forty-eight even. . . . Edgeworth bounced about and talked loud and long. . . . He was not much admired in London. The fact was—everybody cared more about her. She was a nice, little, unassuming 'Jeanie Deans-looking body,' as we Scotch say—and, if not handsome, certainly not ill-looking. Her conversation was as quiet as herself. One would never have guessed she could write her name; whereas her father talked, not as if he could write nothing else, but as if nothing else was worth writing."

These words are somewhat severe; but Maria Edgeworth's inclination to keep in the shade when her beloved father was present, and her modesty in assuming that praise of her works was as much due to him as to herself, must have been rather trying to her admirers. It has indeed been truly said by a recent critic that "in the works undertaken together, Maria's liveliness and intelligence were overweighted," and that it is those novels "in which her genius had free play . . . that keep her memory green even in this busy and forgetful day."*

Maria Edgeworth

Byron's was not a nature to draw out Miss Edgeworth's special powers of conversation, and he evidently had no experience of them. But another contemporary, the American writer Ticknor, has described them. "There was," he says, "a life and spirit about Miss Edgeworth's conversation, she threw herself into it with such abandon; she retorted with such brilliant repartee, and in short she talked with such an extraordinary flow of natural talent, that I don't know whether anything of the kind could be finer."

"Miss Edgeworth is delightful," says Tom Moore, "not from display, but from repose and unaffectedness." "She does not say witty things," wrote Sydney Smith, "but such a perfume of wit runs through all her conversation as makes it very brilliant."

There is a graphic description of Maria at this period given by Joanna Baillie in a letter to Walter Scott, dated July 15, 1813. "If you would give a silver sixpence as you say," she writes, "to see us * See article on Maria Edgeworth in Temple Bar of July 1895.

J. Baillie

A Welcome in London

together, each of us would, I am sure, have given a silver crown to have seen you a third in our party.

“I have found Miss Edgeworth a frank, animated, sensible and amusing woman, entirely free from affectation of any kind, and of a confiding and affectionate and friendly disposition that has really gained upon my heart. We met a good many times, and when we parted she was in tears like one who takes leave of an old friend.

“She has been received by everybody, the first in literature and the first in rank, with the most gratifying eagerness and respect, and has delighted them all. She is cheerful and talks easily and fluently, seems interested in every subject that comes into play, and tells her little anecdote or story (when her father does not take it out of her mouth) very pleasantly. . . .

“You would have been amused,” she adds, “if you had seen with what eagerness people crowded to get a sight of Miss Edgeworth—who is very short—peeping over shoulders and between curled têtes to get but one look. She said herself at a party where I met her, that the crowd closed over her. She did indeed cause a strange commotion and had Madame Staël come, as she was expected, at the same time, I don’t know what would have happened; the town must have run mad altogether.”*

* “Familiar Letters of Sir Walter Scott,” edited by David Douglas, 1894.

Maria Edgeworth

Walter Scott and Maria Edgeworth did not meet until the year 1823, but there is a passage about her in a letter from Scott to Joanna Baillie, written in 1817, that we are tempted to quote here, "About our dear Miss Edgeworth," he writes—"I never saw the criticisms she mentions, but I am sure if they mentioned my name along with hers, I should feel that they did me the highest degree of honour, and I am sure I can venture to say as much for the anonymous author of the novels; supposing that his modesty and good sense bear some proportion to the talents he has displayed. . . . Do say all you can," he remarks, "that is kind on my part to Miss Edgeworth, whose genius honours us all, as her gentleness and modesty honour her genius."*

Again writing to Joanna Baillie when there was a prospect of his meeting Miss Edgeworth, he says: "I expect her to be just what you describe—a being totally void of affectation, and who, like one other lady of my acquaintance, carries her literary reputation as freely and easily as the milkmaid in my country does the leglen, which she carries on her head and walks as gracefully with it as a duchess."

* "Familiar Letters of Sir Walter Scott," edited by David Douglas, 1894.

CHAPTER XIII

LONDON GAIETIES

“A FEW days after we came to town,” writes Miss Edgeworth, “we were told by Mr. Wakefield that there was to be, at the Freemasons’ Tavern, a meeting on the Lancastrian schools, and that the Dukes of Kent and Sussex, Lord Lansdowne, Sir James Macintosh, and Mr. Whitbread were all to speak. We went; fine large hall, ranged with green benches like a lecture-room, raised platform at one end for the performers, arm-chairs for the Royal Dukes, and common chairs for common men. . . .

“Enter on the platform the Royal Dukes, preceded by stewards with white staves [gentlemen of the committee, &c.]. The object of this meeting was to effect a junction between the Bell and Lancastrian parties. . . . Lord Lansdowne spoke extremely well, matter and manner. . . . It had been previously arranged that my father was to move the vote of thanks to the ladies, but of this we knew nothing; and when . . . I heard the Duke of Kent in his sonorous voice say ‘Mr. Edgeworth,’ I was so frightened I dared not look up, but I was soon reassured. My father’s speaking was, next to Lord Lansdowne’s, the best I heard, and loud plaudits convinced me that I was not singular in this opinion.”

Maria Edgeworth

It must have been difficult for Miss Edgeworth to find time for writing all her home letters in the midst of the bustle of her many engagements.

“Yesterday,” she writes, “I had a good hour in comfort to write to you before breakfast, which was scarcely ended when Mr. Wakefield came in with a letter from the Duke of Bedford, who is anxious to see my father’s experiments, on the draft of wheel-carriages, tried. Then came Lord Somerville, who sat and talked and invited us to his country-house, but all this did not forward my letter. Then came Lady Darnley; and then my father walked off with Lord Somerville, and we gave orders no one should be let in; so we only heard vain thunders at the door, and I got on half a page, but then came poor Peggy Langan, and her we admitted. She is in an excellent place . . . and she sat and talked and told of how happy she was and how good her mistress was, and we liked her simplicity and goodness of heart, but, as I said before, all this did not forward my letter.”

We learn from Mrs. Edgeworth that this same

London Gaieties

Peggy Langan was a grand-daughter of the original of Thady in "Castle Rackrent," and that it was a sister of hers who, at twelve years old, baked the rolls when her mother was ill, and suggested the character of Simple Susan.

The story of "Simple Susan" has been a prime favourite with both young and old for many a generation. Miss Edgeworth understood and sympathised with the child-mind in a way that few of our authors have done. On one occasion, we are told, "when she was at a crowded party a little girl suddenly started forth, looked at her hard, and said, 'I like "Simple Susan" best,' and rushed away overwhelmed at her own audacity."

On another occasion Maria had gone to dine at the house of a Mr. Marshall, whose daughter, Lady Monteagle, relates the following anecdote: "Everything had been prepared to do honour to their celebrated guest—the lights were lighted, the viands were cooked. Dinner was announced, and some important person was brought forward to hand Miss Edgeworth down, when it was discovered that she had vanished. For a moment the company and the dinner were all at a standstill. She was a small person, but diligent search was made. Miss Edgeworth had last been seen with the children of the house, and she was eventually found in the back kitchen, escorted by the said children, who, having confided their private affairs to her sympathetic ear, had finally invited her to come with them and see some rabbits which they were rearing down below.”*

Maria Edgeworth

Maria enjoyed intercourse during her visit to London with her cousin the Duchess of Wellington, “charming, amiable Lady Wellington!” She writes: “As she truly said of herself, she is always ‘Kitty Pakenham’ to her friends. After comparison with crowds of others, beaux esprits, fine ladies, and fashionable scramblers for notoriety, her dignified, graceful simplicity rises in one’s opinion, and we feel it with more conviction of its superiority.”

Her appearance at an evening party is thus described by Mrs. Edgeworth: “Yesterday Lady Wellington looked most lovely in grey tabinet, short with fringe at bottom, white shining gauze sleeves, full and twisted round the arm, and at each puff a silver filigree button. On her neck crape folded which left but a small space for a beautiful necklace of tiny shell cameos, set and strung together; and the same crossed her smooth and well-plaited hair which was fastened up in the prettiest penelope with a pearl-topped comb.”

“Many and various are the modes of dressing [the hair],” remarks Mrs. Edgeworth. “I prefer a turban to all others.”

In the same letter the writer speaks of her

* See Lady Ritchie’s essay on “Maria Edgeworth.”

Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.
CATHERINE PAKENHAM, FIRST DUCHESS OF WELLINGTON

London Gaieties

shopping experiences. "While Mr. E. was doing some money business," she writes to her sister, "I went into a showy-looking shop in St. Paul's Churchyard, where my fancy was struck by the enclosed veil. I gave thirty-six shillings for it. The ground is uncommonly fine and clear, and the edge new, the sprig light as you desire. . . . I am not sure what sort of thing you mean by the 'crab's apron.' Pray explain. It is amazing the variety of clothes I see on some people. . . . I have never seen any change of costume in the evening."*

Maria Edgeworth writes: "We have been to a grand night at Mrs. Hope's—the rooms really deserve the French epithet of superbe—all of beauty, rank and fashion that London can assemble, I may say, in the newspaper style, were there. The crowd of carriages was so great that, after sitting waiting in ours for an hour, the coachman told us there was no chance of getting in unless we got out and walked. Another good-natured coachman backed his horses, and we bravely crossed the line and got into the house and up the staircase, but no power of ours could have got us in but for the gloriously large body and the good-natured politeness of the Archbishop of Tuam, who fortunately met us at the door, recognised, and made way for us through the crowd; and in the wake of his greatness we sailed on prosperously and never stopped till he presented us to his beautiful daughter. . . . Among the old beauties the Duchess of Rutland held her pre-eminence and looked the youngest. . . .

* Edgeworth MSS.

Maria Edgeworth

“The Prince Regent stood one-third of the night holding converse with Lady Elizabeth Monk, she leaning gracefully on a bronze ornament in the centre of the room, in the midst of the sacred and very small circle etiquette could keep round them.”

An anecdote of the Prince Regent is mentioned in one of Mrs. Edgeworth's unpublished letters of this date. Lord Whitworth had just been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. “It is said,” she writes, “that at dinner at the Prince Regent's the other day the Prince drank Lord Whitworth's health, saying, ‘I am greatly obliged to you, my Lord, for accepting the government of a country which nothing but a sense of duty could induce you to do. I have already offered it to two dukes and an earl in vain.’ By this speech the unlucky Regent offended all the noblemen in question, insulted Ireland, and did not please Lord Whitworth.”

“We laugh at Maria,” continues the writer, “for having been visited by Ladies Besborough and Melbourne, and the Duchess of Sussex, and the Princess of Wales and all (those) who are setting up new regulations on the strength of wit and blue

1.-A. WALTZ (1802)

London Gaieties

stockings—when beauty and white hose could charm no more.”

We presume that the Princess of Wales must have called by deputy, for later on when she had signified her desire to see Miss Edgeworth at her own residence Mrs. Edgeworth writes: “Maria did not at all like to visit the Princess of Wales. Her father and I fully agreed with her but we feared that from Royalty a request must be considered a command. We consulted Lady Wellington, who referred the case to Lady Liverpool, then considered as the best authority on points of etiquette, and she ruled that Miss Edgeworth might decline the invitation by the simple form of ‘sorry she can’t, previous engagement, &c. &c.’ Maria wrote to that effect to the Princess and heard no more of the matter.”

Miss Berry writes of this singular woman, “Her conversation is certainly uncommonly lively, odd and clever. What a pity that she has not a grain of common sense! Not an ounce of ballast to prevent high spirits . . . from running away with her and allowing her to act indecorously and ridiculously whenever an occasion offers!”

In the following year (1814) the Edgeworth’s friend, young Dr. Henry Holland, accompanied the Princess of Wales, as her physician on a tour in Germany, Switzerland and Italy. One evening when a ball was taking place in a German town, where Court etiquette was very stiff, the Princess requested her doctor to dance with her, which greatly disconcerted the young man. Maria, commenting upon this circumstance in a letter to Dr. Holland's father, says: "My father declares that if he had been in Dr. Holland's situation . . . the moment he had drawn on his gloves, he would have had the cramp suddenly in the calf of his leg, and would have writhed in double agony of body and mind—'absolutely incapable—how unfortunate—of availing himself—high honour—of obeying her Royal Highness's command'—and so have got off and out of the room!"*

Maria Edgeworth

When the Edgeworths were in London in 1813 the waltz was just coming into vogue in fashionable assemblies. It had already appeared in France some years earlier, but under a different form. The dance as we see it to-day was much disapproved by some ladies. Mary Russell Mitford remarks in one of her letters: "I cannot perceive its vaunted grace. What beauty can there be in a series of dizzying evolutions, of which the wearisome monotony banishes all the tricky fancies of the 'poetry of motion,' and conveys to the eyes of the spectators the idea of a parcel of teetotums set a-spinning for their amusement."

"The following anecdote," writes Mrs. Edgeworth, "has been handed about with much applause.

* Edgeworth MSS.

London Gaieties

Lady —— invited Lady Grantham to a ‘waltzing Ball,’ but added in her note, ‘If you don’t waltz don’t come!’ Lady G. replied, ‘I don’t waltz, so I sha’n’t go to your Ball. Will you dine with me on Thursday? But if you don’t eat white soup don’t come!’”*

* Edgeworth MSS.

CHAPTER XIV

THE TRAGIC AND THE COMIC MUSE

MRS. EDGEWORTH, writing on May 29 of their various engagements on the previous evening, says: "Maria was carried off by her father to dine as an author at Johnson's in St. Paul's Churchyard. . . . I dined with the Sneyds in great haste. Then we four and four more of their friends, drove off to Drury Lane, which none of us had yet seen, and were there just in time.

"It is a most beautiful house, and the entrances and exits are better contrived than in any theatre I ever before saw. Near the close of the first act Mr. Edgeworth and Maria arrived—soon after Sir James and Lady Mackintosh. Our box was now full. The play, which was the Castle of Andalusia, did not entertain us much [but] we had our money's worth in looking at the house and prating with the Mackintoshes, who are uncommonly agreeable."*

The opening ceremony of the "New Theatre in

* Edgeworth MSS.

The Tragic and the Comic Muse

Drury Lane” had taken place just six months before the Edgeworths visited the house. The managers had offered a prize of twenty pounds for the best poem or essay to be read on this occasion, and it was this circumstance which called into being the well-known “Rejected Addresses,” by the brothers James and Horace Smith; a series of parodies upon the styles of the most celebrated authors of the day; who are each of them supposed to have competed for the prize. We are tempted to give a few lines of the poem in imitation of Lord Byron’s gloomy muse entitled :

CUI BONO?

BY LORD B.

Sated with home, of wife, of children tired,
The restless soul is driven abroad to roam ;
Sated abroad, all seen, yet nought admired,
The restless soul is driven to ramble home ;
Sated with both, beneath new Drury’s dome
The fiend Ennui awhile consents to pine,
There growls, and curses like a deadly gnome
Scorning to view fantastic Columbine,
Viewing with scorn and hate the nonsense of the Nine.

* * * *

To him whose soul is with fruition fraught,
The song of Braham is an Irish howl ;
Thinking is but an idle waste of thought,
And nought is everything, and everything is nought.

After meeting the brothers Smith in society a few years later, Maria Edgeworth writes: “Mr.

Maria Edgeworth

James Smith told Fanny that he had intended to put me into the 'Rejected Addresses,' and had written a part in the character of an Irish labourer, but it was so flat he threw it aside."

In 1813 Mrs. Siddons, Sir Joshua Reynolds's "Tragic Muse," was still performing occasionally on the London boards, while Mrs. Abington, his "Comic Muse," though now retired altogether from the stage, was still to be seen at times in private parties. "We met one evening at Lady Charleville's Mrs. Abington," writes Mrs. Edgeworth, "with whom Maria was much entertained. She recited two epilogues for us with exquisite wit and grace. She spoke with frankness and feeling of her career, when often after the triumph of success in some brilliant character, splendidly dressed, in the blaze of light, with thunders of applause, she quitted the theatre for her poor little lonely lodging, and admirably described her disenchanted, dispirited sensations."

Miss Edgeworth speaks of looking forward to seeing Mrs. Siddons act on the 25th of May in this year, but unfortunately there is no account of the performance in any of her letters that have been preserved. Some years later, she had the privilege of knowing the great actress in private life. Writing from London in April 1822, she says: "Through Lydia White we have become more acquainted with Mrs. Siddons than I ever expected to be. She gave us the history of her first acting of Lady Macbeth, and of her resolving, in the sleep [walking] scene, to lay down the candlestick, contrary to the precedent of Mrs. Pritchard and all the traditions, before she began to wash her hands and say, 'Out, vile spot!' Sheridan knocked violently at her door, during the five minutes she had desired to have entirely to herself, to compose her spirits before the play began. He burst in, and prophesied that she would ruin herself for ever if she persevered in this resolution to lay down the candlestick! She persisted however in her determination, succeeded, was applauded, and Sheridan begged her pardon. She described well the awe she felt, and the power of the excitement given to her by the sight of Burke, Fox, Sheridan, and Sir Joshua Reynolds in the pit."

Paul GARRARD

MRS. SIDDONS

The Tragic and the Comic Muse

Mrs. Richard Trench wrote in June 1822: "Is it not worth something to have seen Mrs. Siddons in her days of magnificence? Mrs. Siddons, who has lent to the very syllables of her name an elevation and a charm so strong that no effort of mind could now effect their separation—so strong that none who saw her in the splendour of her meridian, ever pronounced that name without a tone and a manner more softened and raised than their habitual discourse.

"She sometimes gave vitality to a line that

Maria Edgeworth

stamped it for ever, while all surrounding recollections have faded away.

“I remember her saying to a servant who had betrayed her, in some play no longer acted: ‘There’s gold for thee; but see my face no more!’

“There is no giving an adequate impression of the might, the majesty of grace she possessed, nor of the effect on a young heart of the deep and mysterious tones of her voice.”*

“Mrs. Siddons is beautiful at this moment,” continues Miss Edgeworth. “She invited us to a private reading-party at her own house. . . . She read one of her finest parts—Queen Katherine. She was dressed so as to do well for the two parts she was to perform this night, of gentlewoman and queen—black velvet, with black velvet cap and feathers. She sat the whole time, with a large Shakespeare before her; as she knew the part of Katherine by heart, she seldom required the help of glasses; and she recited it incomparably well; the changes of her countenance were striking. From her first burst of indignation when she objects to the Cardinal as her judge, to her last expiring scene, all was so perfectly natural and so touching, we could give no applause but tears.”

* See “Remains of Mrs. Richard Trench.”

CHAPTER XV

CHILDE HAROLD AND CORINNE

THE works of Byron and of Mme. de Staël were being much discussed in London society in 1813. The bent of Lord Byron's genius did not much appeal to Maria Edgeworth; the "all for murder, all for crime system of poetry" as she styles it, but she was attracted by the commanding talents of Mme. de Staël. "I have read 'Corinne' with my father," she wrote in 1808, "and I like it better than he does. In one word, I am dazzled by the genius, provoked by the absurdities, and in admiration of the taste and critical judgment of Italian literature displayed throughout the whole work. I almost broke my foolish heart over the end of the third volume, and my father acknowledges he never read anything more pathetic."

Madame de Staël was on her way to England when Miss Edgeworth was in London in May 1813. She had quitted Geneva, weary of the constant trials that accompanied an exile inflicted by Napoleon, and had determined to seek a freer life in England—England, that country “à la fois de la vie de famille et de la liberté publique.” But at this time the Continent was almost closed to a traveller who was under the ban of the Emperor, and she had to reach our shores by way of St. Petersburg!

Maria Edgeworth

Maria Edgeworth writes from London: “I fear Madame de Staël’s arrival may be put off till after we leave town. The Edinburgh review of her book has well prepared all the world for her.”

This book, entitled “De la Littérature,” had appeared before the public in the autumn of 1812. Mme. de Staël’s chief object in coming to England, in June 1813, was to get her new work, “De l’Allemagne,” printed and published there—a work which, it has been said, “constitutes one of her greatest claims to enduring fame.”

The book, which treats solely of German literature, and does not even allude to politics, had been on the eve of publication in Paris in 1810. “It had already been examined, and its publication authorised by the Imperial censors,” writes Sainte-Beuve, “when the police suddenly received orders to effect its destruction, and thus the whole edition (consisting of 10,000 copies) was annihilated. . . . The grief and indignation of Mme. de Staël on the occasion was great, for she saw the results of six years of patient work, and of personal experience, destroyed, and found herself the victim of an increase of cruel persecution at the very moment when she had reason to expect that it was coming to an end."

Childe Harold and Corinne

Mme. de Staël, with all her social endowments and her ardent love of Paris, suffered keenly during her banishment. "No one can have any idea," she wrote to a friend, "what exile is. It is the hundred-headed hydra as regards unhappiness." And again: "One is dead when one is exiled. One's house is but a tomb where the post arrives."

On the birth of Napoleon's child in 1811 "the Préfet of Geneva slyly insinuated to Madame de Staël the advisability of her writing some eulogy, however short, upon the little King of Rome; a course of action which would, he assured her, smooth all difficulties in the future, and would throw open to her every capital in Europe. But not for one instant," remarks Sainte-Beuve, "would she entertain such an idea."

On her arrival in England, in 1813, Mme. de Staël received a kindly and flattering welcome from all our leading statesmen and men of letters, a welcome which she keenly appreciated. The following entry in the "Diary" of Crabb Robinson tells us of the final triumph of "De l'Allemagne." Writing on July 11 (1813), he remarks: "Called this morning on Madame de Staël at 3 George Street, Hanover Square. . . . Murray, the bookseller, was with her, and I assisted in drawing up the agreement for her forthcoming work on Germany, for which she is to receive 1500 guineas."

Maria Edgeworth

During her residence in London Mme. de Staël and Lord Byron were the most prominent figures in society. They formed a curious contrast. Her countenance, which was plain, with the exception of bright, sparkling eyes, was expressive of frankness and enthusiasm, while his face of statuesque beauty reflected the sentiments chiefly of gloom and sarcasm.

"Byron's countenance is fine when it is in repose," writes the Countess Granville, "but the moment it is in play, suspicious, malignant, and consequently repulsive. His manner is either remarkably gracious and conciliatory, with a tinge of affectation, or irritable and impetuous, and then, I am afraid, perfectly natural." "His is a mind," remarks Miss Catherine Fanshaw, "that never conveys the idea of sunshine. It is a dark night upon which the lightning flashes."

The last-named lady has described an evening spent in the company of Mme. de Staël and Lord Byron.

"I have just stayed in London," she writes, "long enough to get a sight of the last-imported lion—Mme. de Staël; but it was worth twenty peeps through ordinary show-boxes, being the longest and most entertaining dinner at which I ever in my life was present. . . .

Childe Harold and Corinne

“Had the whole discourse been written without one syllable of correction, it would be difficult to name a dialogue so full of eloquence and wit. Eloquence is a great word, but not too big for her. . . . The wit was his. . . .

“Mme. de Staël was astonished to hear that this pure and perfect constitution was in need of radical reform . . . and that Great Britain, the bulwark of the world, . . . was herself feeble, disjointed, and almost on the eve of ruin. So at least it was represented by her antagonist in argument, Childe Harold, whose sentiments grew deeper and darker in proportion to her enthusiasm. . . . As foreigners have no idea that any opposition to Government is compatible with general obedience and loyalty, Madame de Staël’s astonishment was unbounded. I thought her perfectly justified in replying to these pathetic mournings over departed liberty: ‘Et vous comptez pour rien la liberté de dire tout cela, et même devant les domestiques!’”

Mme. de Staël’s eloquence was felt to be “rather overwhelming” by those who desired to have a reasonable share in the conversation. Byron remarks in one of his letters: “This lady writes octavos and talks folios. . . . The party went off very well,” he continues, “but we got up too soon after the women; and Mrs. Corinne always lingers so long after dinner that we wish her in—the drawing-room!”

Maria Edgeworth

And he observes pathetically in another letter that it is mortifying "to be checkmated by a plain woman."

"We are now very good friends," he says in a letter dated December 1813; "though the Staël asked Lady Melbourne whether I had really any bonhomie. She might as well have asked that question before she told L. C., 'C'est un démon!' True enough, but rather premature, for she could not have found it out, and so—she wants me to dine there next Sunday."

Soon after "De l'Allemagne" was published Byron was invited to meet the author at Holland House. "What the devil shall I say about 'De l'Allemagne'?" he writes. "I like it prodigiously; but unless I can twist my admiration into some fantastical expression she won't believe me."

"Her works," he says in another letter, "are my delight, and so is she herself for—half an hour. I don't like her politics. . . . But she is a woman by herself, and has done more than all the rest of them together, intellectually;—she ought to have been a man."

The Duke of Wellington said of her: "She was a most agreeable woman, if you only kept her light and away from politics. But that was not easy. She was always trying to come to matters of State. I have said to her more than once: 'Je déteste parler politique'; and she answered: 'Parler politique pour moi c'est vivre.'"

Childe Harold and Corinne

"The Staël is a genius," writes Dr. Bollman, "an extraordinary eccentric woman in all that she does. She only sleeps during a very few hours, and is uninterruptedly and fearfully busy all the rest of the time. Whilst her hair is being dressed, whilst she breakfasts, in fact, during a third of the day, she writes." "But she does not dwell long enough upon anything," remarks Miss Berry; "life, characters, and even feelings, pass before her eyes like a magic-lantern. She spends herself upon paper, and runs through the world to see all, to hear all, and to say all."

CHAPTER XVI

HOPE DAWNS FOR THE DÉTENUS

WE will now return to Lovell Edgeworth, whom we left a prisoner-of-war in the dreary town of Verdun. There he remained for nearly eleven years; but now at last his captivity was drawing to an end.

After the great defeat of Napoleon at Leipzig in November 1813 the Allied armies were known to be gradually approaching the French frontier, and early in January 1814 news arrived that they had actually crossed the Rhine. It was greatly feared by the French Government that the English prisoners might rise, overpower their jailors, and open the gates of the town to the enemy; and an order was issued that the prisoners should be sent in all haste to Blois. "During the three days given for the accomplishment of this order," writes Captain Boys, "scenes of confusion occurred never before witnessed in Verdun. Eleven hundred prisoners of all ranks, rejoicing and exulting in the move; tumultuous assemblages in almost every street; Jews and tradesmen bustling from house to house for payment of debts, when by far the greater number of prisoners were almost penniless; . . . Major de Meulan [the commandant] gone to Blois; hence no commanding officer [on the scene], no arrangements, no subordination, and the feeble French authorities in hourly dread of the English taking possession of the place. . . .

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

“Vehicles and draught quadrupeds of every description were put in requisition, and congregated masses of youth and age, of vigour and infirmity, moved off in dense confusion, affording a faint idea of Israel’s retreat from the land of Egypt.”*

A further removal of the prisoners was soon found to be necessary, and they were sent for the most part to various central fortified towns, where already more than 20,000 English captives were languishing; but a few were forwarded to Paris, and among these latter was Lovell Edgeworth.

Happily he has left an account of his experiences during this stirring time. The MS. is docketed as follows by his sister, Maria Edgeworth:

“This is a narrative which Lovell spoke to my father the evening after he came home, and I afterwards wrote it down as nearly as I could recollect it, I believe almost word for word.—M. E.”

* “Narrative of a Captivity, Escape, and Adventures,” by Edward Boys, Captain R.N.

Maria Edgeworth

“ On the 27th of January, 1814, when the Allies were approaching Paris, I was alarmed by a report that all the English prisoners would immediately be ordered out of Paris, and sent back to Verdun, to Blois, Gueret, or some other of the Depôts. . . . I knew that if once I should be sent away from Paris my chance of obtaining my liberty, my hopes of soon returning home, would be at an end. I had not a single friend in power, or a single friend connected with those in power. The only person to whom I thought I could venture at this moment to apply was the Comte Réal, an officer high in the Police, next in authority to Savary, Duc de Rovigo (famous or infamous all over Europe for his letter to Madame de Staël ordering her out of Paris). To M. le Comte Réal I was a stranger, but I knew that he was a man of science and literature, and Sir Humphry Davy had told me that he had given the book my father had just published, ‘Essay on the Construction of Roads and Wheel Carriages,’ to M. le Comte Réal, and that he had spoken of it with approbation. Upon this hint I spake—no, I wrote to the Count, and with my letter in my pocket I went to Beauvilliers’, the traiteur where I usually dined.

“ At Beauvilliers’ there was a certain boy who had . . . served me in the capacity of a shoe-boy. I had taught him to read and write, and with a prentice fee of a few guineas I had placed him with Beauvilliers, to keep him, if possible, out of the way of the conscription. . . . Beauvilliers had behaved handsomely about this boy, had taken him for less than the usual fee, and had always been kind to him. The boy was an excellent creature, very grateful and affectionate. I never shall forget his look when I told him that I was afraid I should be ordered away from Paris and that I should lose all chance of getting home to my friends. . . . [It seemed] as if he had been suddenly stupefied. When he recovered the use of his senses he went to tell his master, Beauvilliers, the bad news. Beauvilliers, who, on the boy's account, interested himself warmly for me, declared that he would apply directly to a great friend of his, Regnault St. Jean d'Angely, who was at that time a man high in power above the Duc de Rovigo in the Police, Conseiller d'Etat—Ministre—a word or a line from him would do my business at once. Beauvilliers threw off his cook's jacket, said he would powder and dress immediately and go to St. Jean and do his best for me. So he powdered and dressed and went to St. Jean, and carried my letter to the Comte Réal, that he might shew it to St. Jean to prove that I was a savant and son of a savant and un bon sujet, and so forth.

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

“What my traiteur said to St. Jean, or St. Jean to the traiteur, I do not know, but Beauvilliers returned in high spirits and assured me that I might remain securely at Paris, for that St. Jean d'Angely liked my letter and said he would write about me himself. This was very good news; but day passed after day, and no regular written permission to remain in Paris came to me, and I was afraid that the underlings of the Police would be with me again. Beauvilliers laughed at my fears. What! when St. Jean d'Angely had spoken; when St. Jean d'Angely had promised to speak, what could I fear? 'Allez! Allez! Ne craignez rien. Soyez tranquille.' I persisted, however, in observing that I was not in order remaining this way upon sufferance, and Beauvilliers was quite provoked, and muttered, 'Mauvaise tête! Mauvaise tête! These English must always be doing something.'

Maria Edgeworth

"Notwithstanding Beauvilliers' ne craignez rien, an officer of the Police brought me, on the 1st of March, a passport and an order immediately to leave Paris for Blois.

"Beauvilliers and my grateful boy were now in the utmost consternation. On the 2nd, Beauvilliers went to St. Jean d'Angely again, and St. Jean said he would see me the next day. Accordingly the next day I waited upon him, having taken the precaution to write my business as shortly as possible on a slip of paper. . . .

"When I arrived at St. Jean d'Angely's magnificent Hotel, it happened that there was no servant in waiting in the ante-chamber. I made my own way forward, however, . . . till I came to an apartment at the end of which was a glass door, through which I saw St. Jean sitting with another person in earnest conversation. St. Jean turned his head, saw me, started up, came out in a fury, in which there seemed some mixture of terror, exclaiming, “Qui est tu? Qui est tu? Que fais tu là?” I stood perfectly still, and I believe without changing countenance in the least, trusting that my composure might convince him I had no bad designs—that, in short, I was not an assassin, for which he seemed to take me. I said very quietly, ‘I feared I had mistaken my way and had intruded upon him, but I had not seen any domestics in the ante-chamber.’ ‘Ah, ce n’est que cela, c’est bon,’ said he—then pointing to the door of another apartment on the opposite side, bade me pass that way and give my letter to his secretary.

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

“The secretary before whom my slip of paper was laid . . . exclaimed on seeing the name of Edgeworth, and asked with some emotion if I was any relation to the Mr. and Miss Edgeworth, the authors. I answered that I was the son of the Mr. Edgeworth of whom he spoke, and the brother of Miss Edgeworth. ‘What, the Mr. and Miss Edgeworth who wrote ‘L’Education Pratique’?’ ‘Yes.’ Then the secretary made many enthusiastic exclamations, and spoke of the book in a manner that would have gratified me at any time, but which was at this moment peculiarly agreeable. The secretary said that he had made a number of extracts from the work once, when it had been lent to him, but that he had never been able to procure a copy of it, though he inquired at many booksellers. From compliments he proceeded to business, and he appeared quite in earnest and zealous about a letter (from St. Jean d'Angely) to the Duc de Feltre (on my behalf), which he assured me should be written without delay. . . . It was a point of no small consequence at this crisis to make a friend of this great man's secretary, for the expediting of my affairs depended on him. . . .

Maria Edgeworth

“ I spent the greater part of the next day in hunting every bookseller's shop in Paris for a copy of ‘L'Education Pratique.’ At last I was so lucky as to find one, and I believe it was the only copy in Paris. I sent it to my friend the secretary, who at my request gave me a copy of the letter to the Duc de Feltre, which was as follows:

“ ‘ Copie Confidentielle à S. E. M.

“ ‘ MONSIEUR LE DUC,

“ ‘ M. Lovell Edgeworth, Irlandois d'origine, & demeurant à Paris, Hôtel du Rhin & Moselle, Place Vendôme, est soumis à l'ordre de votre Excellence; qui renvoie de Paris les Anglois qui s'y trouvent. Résident en France depuis onze ans, fils d'un homme qui a rendue des services à Lyons—

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

frère du célèbre auteur Mademoiselle Edgeworth, il ne s'occupe lui-même absolument, que de littérature ! Il est connu de plusieurs académiciens à Paris, & même très lié avec M. Arnault, mon beau-frère. Je prie votre Excellence de ne pas exiger que ce savant subisse une expulsion qui ferait un tort extrême à ses travaux littéraires, et de vouloir bien m'adresser une autorisation particulière d'exception en faveur de cet étranger paisible, qui je recommande pour son mérite & ses qualités personnelles à toutes vos bontés.

“ Je prie votre Excellence, &c.’

“ But this letter to the Duc de Feltre, though written and sent, never was to be answered, and never was of any service to me. In a few days the situations of the Duc de Feltre, of St. Jean d'Angely, of his secretary, and of myself were completely changed. The fate of Paris and of Europe miraculously changed.

[But this could not be foreseen.]

“ . . . Of the movements of the armies which were at this time so near Paris, we were in ignorance. One moment we were told Buonaparte had gained a great victory . . . that the Allies were retreating ; then that he had surrounded them, &c. We heard only what Buonaparte's emissaries chose that we should be told. . . . [But] facts at last spoke for themselves, and the truth made its way to our ears and hearts in language that could not be misunderstood.

Maria Edgeworth

“On the 28th of March we heard the rolling of cannon in the streets. The next day the Empress left Paris. On the 30th, as I was dining at the house of a friend, we heard firing. I looked out of the window, and saw the cross-firing from the heights of Montmartre. The Allied armies were firing upon Paris. Then I knew that all was over. Those heights occupied by the Allies commanded the city. Paris, we knew, must surrender. All was joy now among the English prisoners. My own transports of delight I will not—I cannot describe.

“On the morning of the 31st I saw fires in the Place Vendôme, and found that they were burning papers belonging to the Etat-major, feu de joie to me! This day the Allied armies entered Paris as friends. The liberation of the English prisoners was soon afterwards declared. . . .

“It would be difficult to tell whether at this moment my grateful boy felt most joy or sorrow. He rejoiced with me in my deliverance, but, poor fellow, he was very sorry to part with me. For any little services I had been able to do him his gratitude overpaid me. And, but for the miraculous events which changed all our situations in a manner which the most romantic could not have foreseen, I must have owed my return to my country and family to this boy’s gratitude, [as shown] in the interest with which he inspired Beauvilliers the traiteur in my favour.

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

“What became of St. Jean d’Angely? He was no longer a great man. All was broken up in his department. All in his Hotel was in confusion. I am sorry to say that my friend St. Jean acted but a shabby part. He ran away, or, as his friends said, he mounted his horse and rode out of Paris into the country.”

We are able to gather some further details of this gentleman’s flight from the Rev. Edward Stanley, who visited Paris a few months later. Writing to a friend, he says: “You will like to hear something of Edgeworth’s friend St. Jean d’Angely. He came up to the barrier where our landlord (who had fought in the battle of Marengo) was posted. Here he called loudly for some brandy, for which he got laughed at by the whole line of guard. He then sallied forth and proceeded a short distance, when his horse took fright, and as St. Jean was (as our landlord told us) ‘entièrement du même avis avec son cheval,’ they both set off as fast as they could, and were in a few minutes far beyond all danger; nor did they appear again amid the din of arms.

“The heights were defended,” remarks Stanley, “in a very inadequate and unsoldier-like manner; not a single work was thrown up before the guns, no entrenchments, no bastions. . . . The barriers

Maria Edgeworth

all round Paris are hemmed round with palisades with loopholes, each of which might have been demolished by half a dozen rounds from a six-pounder: the French, indeed, laugh at them. . . . These [palisades] are made of la bois de tremble (aspen), and the pun was that the fortifications tremblaient partout.”*

“Most of the English prisoners,” continues Lovell, “who were thus suddenly set at liberty, instead of being in haste to leave Paris, were determined to remain to see the catastrophe of all these wonderful events. . . . But I was resolved to make no delay; I was too impatient to see my father and my friends at home once more. . . . I found, however, it was impossible to leave Paris for a few days; at least it was impossible to get to Calais. The roads were not safe. Our friends the Cossacks were robbing night and day. I was compelled to have patience, till the diligence could run with safety, for there was no other means of travelling. In the course of these few days that I was detained I saw a great deal of the Parisians.

“Will it be believed? Can it be believed that many people whom I met at this time in Paris, people not of the lower, but of the middle class, scarcely knew, or recollected, that there existed, or had ever existed, such persons as the Bourbons?

* “Before and after Waterloo,” by Rev. Edward Stanley, sometime Bishop of Norwich.

Hope Dawns for the Détenus

They asked me various questions about the life and death of Louis the sixteenth, and when I mentioned Louis the eighteenth and Monsieur they hardly knew who they were. In fact, since the French Revolution, since the period when Louis the sixteenth was guillotined, a new generation had grown up, and had seen nothing that could remind them of the past. . . .

“Several ladies of the families of the ancient nobility were at this crisis very zealous and active in the cause of the Bourbons, and certainly they had considerable influence over the minds of the people, reviving among them the old national sentiment of Vive le Roi! and preparing to raise the cry of ‘Vive Louis dix-huit!’ A friend of mine, Madame de Roquefeuille, one of the old nobility, one of the ladies who formerly attended Mesdames in their flight into Italy, was now conspicuously zealous for the restoration of the Bourbons.

“After the capital had capitulated, just before the Allies entered Paris, Madame de Roquefeuille went early in the morning in an open barouche into the Place Louis quinze; there she distributed white cockades and ribbons among the people who had collected in crowds to hear the news. She explained to them who Monsieur and Louis the eighteenth are, told them that these descendants from their rightful kings were coming back to them, that there would be no more conscriptions. Then instructed them what to say and when to cry ‘Vive Alexandre!’ ‘Vive le Prince!’ and ‘Vive Louis XVIII.!’ when the Allies should make their appearance in Paris.

Maria Edgeworth

“All that happened in Paris at this time was certainly most interesting and curious. I should have liked to have seen more of the emotions of the people and of the various turns and management of the popular mind, but I set out in the second diligence that ran, and I was, as I believe, the first English prisoner who quitted Paris.”

CHAPTER XVII

THE BOURBONS RESTORED

"THE fate of Paris," writes the Rev. Edward Stanley, "was decided with a rapidity and sang-froid quite astonishing. By five o'clock in the evening [of March 31st] all was entirely at an end, and the National Guard and the Allies incorporated, and doing the usual duty of the town. . . . The next day the Palais Royal was as brilliant and more cheerful than ever, with its motley groups of visitors."*

"In this town," writes the Comtesse de Boigne,† "neither warfare, nor foreign occupation, nor rioting, nor disturbances of any kind, can modify the finery of the women. On Tuesday they were parading their plumed hats upon the boulevards in the midst of the wounded, defying the shells. On Wednesday they were witnessing the Allied army march past. On Thursday they appeared in

* See "Before and after Waterloo."

† "Mémoires de la Comtesse de Boigne," par M. Charles Nicoullaud, 1907.

Maria Edgeworth

their most elegant costumes in the midst of the bivouac of the Cossacks in the Champs Elysées!

“This bivouac,” she says, “formed a singular spectacle. It was indeed strange to behold these inhabitants of the banks of the Don peacefully engaged in their ordinary avocations in the heart of Paris! They had neither tents nor shelter of any kind. Three or four of their horses were tied to each tree, whilst the riders sat on the ground hard by, talking together in gentle tones, and mending their boots or their horses’ harness.

“These Cossacks allowed the sightseers to come close to them, especially the women and children, who were literally upon their very shoulders.”

Writing during the first week of April, the Comtesse says: “Early on Friday morning [a friend] sent us word that the sovereigns were going to the Opera that evening. Immediately our servants were sent off on a campaign to secure boxes so that we might be there in full force. The artificial flower-makers were besieged to furnish us with lilies to be worn in our hair, in bouquets, and in garlands. The men wore the white cockade in their hats.

“So far,” she remarks, “all was well; but I blush, as a Frenchwoman, to record our behaviour at this performance. In the first place, we began by applauding the Emperor Alexander and the King of Prussia to the skies. In the next, we had the doors of our boxes thrown open, and the greater the throng of foreign officers who entered, the more we were delighted. . . .

The Bourbons Restored

“Just before the sovereigns entered the imperial box, some young Frenchmen of our party went into the box and covered the imperial eagle, surmounting its draperies, with a white handkerchief. At the end of the performance these same young men shattered the eagle to pieces with hammers amidst our enthusiastic applause.”

On April 11 Napoleon signed the Act of Abdication at Fontainebleau and soon afterwards was on his way to the Island of Elba. On May 3 Louis XVIII. entered the capital of France.

The Comtesse de Boigne describes this great event: “We went to see the entry of the King from a house in the Rue St. Denis,” she writes. “The crowd was great, and most of the windows were decorated with garlands, mottoes, fleur-de-lys, and white banners.

“The foreigners had had the grace to confine their troops to barracks, as they had done during the entry of Monsieur. The town was consigned to the care of the National Guard, and the absence of foreign uniforms was refreshing to the eyes.

“The old Imperial Guard formed the escort of the royal procession. They advanced rapidly, silent and mournful, full of remembrances of the past; the shouts of ‘Vive le Roi!’ died away as they moved forward. . . . The silence increased till soon we heard nothing but the monotonous click of their horses' hoofs, which echoed in our hearts.

Maria Edgeworth

AWAITING THE KING'S ENTRY

The sadness of these old warriors was truly contagious, [and] gave to the whole ceremony rather the appearance of the Emperor's funeral than that of the King's accession."

Maria Edgeworth, writing to a friend of the Royal entry, says that an eye-witness who had

The Bourbons Restored

stood close to a body of the soldiers told her he heard them call out repeatedly, "Vive l'Empereur! Vive Napoléon!" "Berthier," he said, "who rode before the King's carriage, did not dare to look at, or towards, the troops, but rode on with his eyes down."*

"The King," continues the Comtesse, "was in an open carriage, with Madame † at his side. . . . He wore a blue coat with very large epaulettes, and the blue order and badge of the Saint Esprit. . . . He presented Madame to the people with an affected and theatrical gesture. She took no part in these demonstrations, but remained impassive. Her red eyes gave the impression that she was crying. The people respected her silent grief and sympathised in it.

". . . The Duchesse d'Angoulême was the only member of the royal family of whom any remembrance existed. The younger generation knew nothing of our princes; but every one knew that Louis XVI., the Queen, and Madame Elizabeth had perished on the scaffold. To the crowd Madame was the orphan of the Temple prison, and upon her centred all the interest aroused by such tragic events."

Maria Edgeworth, writing to a relative, expresses her astonishment at the wonderful events that were

* Edgeworth MSS.

† The Duchesse d'Angoulême.

Maria Edgeworth

succeeding each other in France! "A revolution without bloodshed!" she exclaims; "Paris taken without being pillaged! The Bourbons, after all hope and reason for hope had passed, restored to their capital and their palaces!" And another English writer of mark—Mrs. Barbauld—commenting on the same events, exclaims: "France, proud France, gallant France, is a conquered country. I do not think we yet know her real inclinations; convulsed by a revolution, tyrannised over by a despot, and owing her deliverance to her very enemies—how she is humbled, how much she has suffered; but how much she has inflicted! The French, however, have a better chance for happiness with the mild imbecility of the Bourbons than with Napoleon."

A friend, writing to Miss Berry from Paris on May 11, says: "Paris is certainly at this moment the most wonderful show-box in the world. It has within its walls as many live emperors, kings and generals, and eminent persons of all kinds, as the ingenious Mrs. Salmon ever exhibited in wax. Of the five great sovereigns of the Christian world, four are here actually present; and we have every eminent military commander in Europe except Buonaparte and Bernadotte. I say nothing of princes and prime ministers, though they are here in plenty."

In the month of June the Allied sovereigns quitted

The Bourbons Restored

Paris, and the Emperor of Russia, the King of Prussia, General Blucher and many other distinguished persons visited England. The Emperor Alexander was extremely popular here as being not only our ally, but the head of a nation which had actually set fire to its ancient capital to enforce the retreat of Napoleon and his invading army. Mrs. Stanley writes from London on June 16: * “Yesterday after church we went to the Park. It was a beautiful day. . . . Such a crowd of people I could not have conceived, and such an animated crowd. As the white plumes of the Emperor’s Guard danced among the trees, the people all ran first to one side and then to the other. It was impossible to resist the example and we ran too, backwards and forwards over the same hundred yards four times, and were rewarded by seeing the Ranger of the Forest, Lord Sydney, get a good tumble, horse and all! We saw Lord Castlereagh almost pulled off his horse by congratulations, and [with] huzzahs as loud as the Emperor’s; and a most entertaining walk we had. . . .

“One [person] says the Emperor is gone this way, and another that way . . . and all a foxhound’s sagacity is necessary to scent him successfully, for he slips round by backways and in plain clothes.”

* See “Before and After Waterloo.”

Maria Edgeworth

No wonder the Emperor tried to escape, for the people were so wildly enthusiastic, we have been told by one who could remember this stirring time, that if they could arrest his progress but for an instant, they would crowd round his horse to kiss it!

“At our dinner,” writes Mrs. Stanley, “Mr. Tennant said in his dry way that ‘Have you seen the Emperor?’ has entirely superseded the use of ‘How do you do?’”

Blucher also came in for his share of the general ovation.

“In the morning Mr. Tennant had gone into a shop to buy some gloves, and whilst he was trying them on the shopman suddenly exclaimed, ‘Blucher! Blucher!’ cleared the counter at a leap, followed by all his apprentices, and Mr. Tennant remained soberly amongst the gloves to make his own selection, for he saw nothing more of his dealers!”

“It is in vain,” writes the sedate Mrs. Barbauld, “even to bespeak a pair of shoes—not a man will work. . . . Everybody has been idle since these royal personages came amongst us.

“Will not you come to London,” she asks her correspondent, “to see all these sights? You are much mistaken if you think that you shall find us anxiously speculating about the liberties of Europe. We shall be squeezing to get a sight of Alexander

The Bourbons Restored

. . . looking at the Prince's fireworks and criticising the Oldenburg hat!"

So great was the enthusiasm throughout the British Isles for the Emperor of Russia, that an old Fifeshire woman living in the remote village of Cairnayhill sent him a present of a pair of stockings, knitted for him by herself, together with a Bible. These gifts, we are told, were kindly and graciously acknowledged by the Emperor.

"At the reception at Sir Joseph Banks' house last night," writes Mrs. Stanley, "the most interesting object of the evening was a sword come down from heaven on purpose for the Emperor! Let the Prince Regent and his garters, and the merchants and the aldermen and everybody, hide their diminished heads! What are they and their gifts to the Philosophers?"

"This is literally a sword made by Sowerby from the iron from some meteoric stone lately fallen—of course in honour of the Emperor!"

CHAPTER XVIII

NAPOLEON AT THE TUILERIES AGAIN

“EARLY in the year 1815, a Congress of eight of the principal European Powers assembled at Vienna,” writes a learned historian, “to regulate the affairs of Europe; but they had not proceeded far in their labours when they were astonished with the intelligence that Buonaparte had escaped from Elba!”

In the Times of March 11 we read: “Early yesterday morning we received by express from Dover, the important but lamentable intelligence of a civil war having been again kindled in France by that wretch Buonaparte. . . . He sailed from Elba with all his guards between 12 and 1300 in number on the night of the 28th ult., and landed near Fréjus in France on the 3rd instant.”

Napoleon had really landed on March 1, so that ten days had elapsed before the “Dover express” brought the news to England.

A friend, writing to Miss Berry from Nice on March 3, says:

Napoleon at the Tuileries Again

“The day before yesterday Buonaparte landed at, or near, Cannes, with five, six or eight hundred soldiers and two pieces of cannon. He met with no obstacle. . . . He proceeded to Grasse . . . but set off about the middle of the day yesterday, and reached, it is said, Castellane . . . the route to Gap and Grenoble; which route it is imagined he is to follow. Thus far is certain; the flying reports are that Buonaparte distributes proclamations, saying he is come to the liberation of his faithful subjects, that the eagles are on the wing, will perch from spire to spire, and soon reach those of Nôtre Dame. . . . The Prince of Monaco was detained by a party of Buonaparte’s soldiers on his road here; they led him to Buonaparte, who asked him where he was going. ‘Home,’ was his reply. ‘So am I,’ rejoined the other. . . .

“One is as astonished at this event,” remarks the writer, “as if it had not been in the least probable [but] how could anybody suppose it would have been otherwise? They whipped the naughty boy, and put him in a corner, and supposed he would stay there!”

Mme. d’Arblay has described the effect produced in Paris by the tidings of Buonaparte’s landing. “Wonder at his temerity,” she says, “was the impression made by the news, but wonder un-mixed with apprehension. . . . A torpor indescribable, a species of stupor utterly undefinable, seemed to have enveloped the capital with a mist that was impervious. Everybody went about their affairs, made or received visits, met and parted, without speaking, or, I suppose, thinking of this event as of a matter of any importance. My own participation in this improvident blindness is to myself incomprehensible."

Maria Edgeworth

But the very King himself it seems shared in this blindness.

"When Louis XVIII. received the diplomatic corps on March 7," writes a newspaper correspondent, "his Majesty said to the ambassadors, 'Write to your respective courts that I am well, and that the foolish enterprise of that man shall as little disturb the tranquillity of Europe as it has disturbed mine.'"

At last the danger began to be realised. "Brief," writes Mme. d'Arblay, "was the illusion, and fearful was the light by which its darkness was dispersed. In a few days we heard that Buonaparte, whom we had concluded to be, either stopped at landing and taken prisoner, or forced to save himself by flight, was, on the contrary, pursuing unimpeded his route to Lyons."

It was now evident to all that the French troops could not be relied upon to resist his advance. A writer to the Times of March 23 says: "The insanity of looking up to the fiend Buonaparte as a tutelary deity is contagious amongst them. He flatters their basest passions, inflames their most violent prejudices, holds out to them fruitful harvests of glory and plunder, promises to gratify their revenge, and to wipe away their feelings of past disgrace; in short, he acts the tempter so effectually that the loyalty and honour of the soldiery have, in general, been found to be feeble preservatives against corruption."

Napoleon at the Tuileries Again

"His march," says another writer, "has been a triumphal procession. He has nowhere experienced the slightest resistance, and the only bloodshed has been that of General Marchand at Grenoble, who was shot by his soldiers on account of his fidelity to Louis XVIII."*

On the night of March 19, the King fled from Paris, and the following night Napoleon took possession of the city and was installed once more in the palace of the Tuileries, as Emperor of the French.

Napoleon now felt the necessity of getting persons of standing in the country to uphold his rule; and he had the temerity to write to Mme. de Staël, formerly the object of his persistent persecution, to beg her to come to Paris, "as her presence was required for constitutional ideas." "You have done without a constitution," she replied, "and without me for twelve years, and even * See "Pope of Holland House," edited by W. P. Courtney.

Maria Edgeworth

now you are not more fond of one than of the other.”

His overtures to her friend Benjamin Constant, in spite of seeming difficulties, proved more successful. This gentleman had just written a lampoon against the late Emperor, which happened to appear in the Moniteur the very day before Napoleon made his entry into Paris.

“When poor Benjamin became aware of this,” writes the Comtesse de Boigne, “terror seized upon his heart, which was by no means of as lofty a nature as his head. He flew to the posting-houses—no horses to be had—diligences and mail-coaches crammed with fugitives, there was no means of quitting Paris. Thus baffled he took refuge in an obscure lodging where he hoped to remain undiscovered. Judge then of his dismay when the next morning he was sent for by Fouché! More dead than alive Constant obeyed the summons. Fouché received him very politely, and informed him that the Emperor desired to see him at once. This seemed strange, but still he felt somewhat reassured. On reaching the Tuileries all doors opened before him.

“The Emperor accosted Benjamin in the most gracious manner, begged him to be seated, and then opened the conversation by assuring him that his own past experiences had had their due effect upon his mind. During his long watches in the Island of Elba he had reflected deeply upon his own situation and upon the needs of the time; men were evidently desiring liberal institutions. The mistake of his administration, he said, had been the neglect of publicists such as M. Constant. A constitution was required and he intended to apply to the chief lights of the Empire for its formation.

Napoleon at the Tuileries Again

“Benjamin thus passed, in the space of one half-hour, from the fear of a dungeon to the joy of being summoned to play the part of a lesser Solon. . . . The author of the article in the Moniteur of March 19 became a State Councillor on the 22nd and Buonaparte’s most ardent advocate.”

CHAPTER XIX

THE GREAT ENCOUNTER

LOUIS XVIII. was attended in his flight by his Garde du Corps in which M. d'Arblay was a general officer. Mme. d'Arblay, in company with her friend the Princesse d'Hénin, quitted Paris the same day as the King (March 19). She describes vividly in her "Diary" their hurried journey to the frontier with all its painful incidents.

"No one knew," she says, "where the King was seeking shelter; no one knew whether he meant to resign his crown in hopeless inaction, or whether to contest it in sanguinary civil war. Every family, therefore, with its every connexion in the whole empire of the French, was involved in scenes upon which hung prosperity or adversity, reputation or disgrace, honour or captivity." For the time being the provinces were under no authority. "No orders were sent to them by either party. The King and his government were too imminently in personal danger to assert their rights. Buonaparte and his followers and supporters were too much engrossed by taking possession of the capital, and too uncertain of their success, to try a power which had as yet no basis. . . . The people, as far as we could see or learn, seemed passively waiting the event."

The Great Encounter

Buonaparte, apparently oblivious of what the countries of Europe had suffered at his hands, issued a proclamation addressed to each of the crowned heads beginning with the words, "Sire my brother," but they declined to have anything to do with this would-be brother.

It was found that the King had fled first to Lille, and afterwards to Ghent; but Brussels was the seat of rendezvous for many of the French royalists and also for the British, both military and civil. Here Mme. d'Arblay found shelter, and here she was occasionally joined by her husband when he could be spared from his arduous duties. She lodged in the Place du Marché-aux-Bois.

Early in May, she tells us, a grand concert was given in the city, being the benefit of the celebrated singer Mme. Catalani. On this occasion she saw for the first time the Duke of Wellington, and was "struck with his noble and singular physiognomy. . . ." "He was gay even to sportiveness," she says, and "seemed enthusiastically charmed with Catalani, ardently applauding whatsoever she sang except 'Rule Britannia.' Then with sagacious reserve, he listened in utter silence

Maria Edgeworth

. . . and when an encore began to be vociferated from his officers, he instantly crushed it by a commanding air of disapprobation."

Five weeks later, on Friday, June 16, Mme. d'Arblay writes: "I was awakened at about five o'clock in the morning by the sound of a bugle horn in the Marché-aux-Bois. I started up and opened the window. But I only perceived some straggling soldiers hurrying in different directions, and saw lights gleaming from some of the chambers in the neighbourhood; all again was soon still . . . and I retired once more to my pillow."

A few hours later she found the whole town in a state of commotion and excitement. It was known that Buonaparte's army had crossed the Belgian frontier, and the great battle had already begun. News, she tells us, was arriving incessantly from the scene of action with ever-varying details, but Buonaparte was always said to be advancing—and advancing upon Brussels. A panic began to spread among the English residents. Madame d'Arblay's situation, as being the wife of a general officer in the Garde du Corps of Louis XVIII., was especially critical. Some friends urged her to fly with them to Antwerp and an attempt was made to do so, but in vain. All available horses and vehicles and even the very barges on the canal had been taken possession of by other fugitives or put in requisition by the military authorities. It was found impossible to quit Brussels.

The Great Encounter

“What a day of confusion and alarm,” writes Mme. d’Arblay, “did we spend on the 17th! That day and the 18th I passed in hearing the cannon.” At one time a Hanoverian troop of Huzzars galloped through the town crying out that the Allied army was defeated and the French in hot pursuit. Mme. d’Arblay did not hear their words, but she was startled by the “sound of a howl, violent, loud, affrighting, issuing from many voices.” “I ran to the window,” she writes, “and saw the Marché-aux-Bois suddenly filling with a populace, pouring in from all its avenues, and hurrying on rapidly . . . while women with children in their arms or clinging to their clothes ran screaming out of doors; I saw windows closing and shutters fastening. This was followed, in another [moment], by a burst into my apartment to announce the French were come!

“How terrific,” she exclaims, “was this moment! . . . I crammed my papers and money into a basket, and throwing on a shawl and bonnet I flew downstairs and out of doors . . .* I determined to fly to the house of Mme. de Maurville, who had promised to receive me as a part of her own house [hold] by the name of Mme. de Burney. In traversing the streets the disorder and despair strongly affected me. . . . There could be no stronger proof of the real horror which Buonaparte inspired.

* The remainder of Mme. d’Arblay’s narrative is taken from an unpublished letter with the exception of the short sentence within brackets.

Maria Edgeworth

“With Mme. de Maurville I remained shut up till about ten o’clock at night, witnessing from the window incessant arrivals of wounded, maimed, ill or dying; on foot, on horse, on brancards, in carts, and in waggons!—a sight to break one’s heart. . . . The door was never opened but I felt myself . . . chill with fear of some sanguinary attack.

“[The dearth of any positive news from the field of battle at this crisis, when everything that was dear . . . was at stake, was . . . distracting in its torturing suspense. . . . ‘Retreat’ and ‘defeat’ were the words in every mouth around me! . . .] At last an English gentleman, belonging to some army office, came to tell us he thought all was going well. He was just returned from the field of battle, and said the report that had so dreadfully alarmed the town of the arrival of des Français was true, though without alarm; for des Français were indeed by hundreds arrived—as prisoners!”

These prisoners afterwards declared that Napoleon had cried out continually to them during the battle: “A Bruxelles, mes enfants! à Bruxelles! à Bruxelles!”

The Great Encounter

On returning home Mme. d'Arblay found that her friends were still making arrangements to escape to Antwerp, and they pressed her to accompany them. Whilst the matter was under debate, a certain Captain Marshall came into the room.

"He told me," writes Mme. d'Arblay, "that he did not think there was any danger for Brussels that day (Monday).

"'Then,' quoth I, 'there can be none at all! for if Buonaparte does not obtain Brussels by a coup de main, he can only obtain it by the loss of Paris—since if he stays longer away the Allies will enter in his absence, and the victory of a town will cost him a kingdom.'

". . . The D. of Wellington," she continues, "is just gone back to the army. He came hither yesterday when the battle was over, and the long pursuit in progress of Buonaparte, who has, however, escaped once more; but so beaten that how he will be received in France, or whether received at all, is doubtful.

". . . Meanwhile the D. of Fitzjames is commissioned to go from the Duke to Louis XVIII. to advise his Majesty de se rendre à Tournai, and thence to go at once into France. . . .

"How astonishing! The Duke then thinks his great battle already decisive!"

No one dared as yet to cherish this idea.

Maria Edgeworth

An officer in the British army writes from the Bivouac near Cateau on June 22: "The fate of Europe has perhaps been decided in one battle. . . . We are moving on with the Prussians, and the French are still flying. The fugitive will be driven to Paris, for I really do not think he will be able to face us at Laon."*

We have a glimpse of Napoleon in his flight from the pen of Alexandre Dumas.† Dumas, then a child, was in the village of Villers-Cotterets on June 21, where just nine days earlier he had seen Napoleon pass on his way to Belgium in military state, and amid the shouts of "Vive l'Empereur!"

"At seven o'clock in the morning of the 21st," he tells us, "a courier, covered with mud, dashed into the village. He drew rein for an instant at the posting-house, and ordered four horses to be in readiness for a carriage that was quickly following and without giving one word of explanation dashed off again.

"The four horses were taken out of the stables, and harnessed ready for the expected carriage. A heavy rumble, that grew louder and louder, announced its rapid approach and soon we saw it appear round the corner of the street and stop at the inn door.

* See "Pope of Holland House."

† "Mes Mémoires," par Alexandre Dumas, pub. 1852.

The Great Encounter

“The innkeeper advanced and stood stupefied. I took hold of his coat-tails and asked, ‘Is it he? Is it the Emperor?’

“‘Yes.’

“It was indeed the Emperor, just in the same place and in the same carriage, with an aide-de-camp beside him and another opposite.

“But these men were neither Jérôme nor Letort.

“Letort was killed, and Jérôme was commissioned to rally the army near Laon.

“It was just the same man, it was just the same pale, sickly impassive face, but his head was bent rather more down upon his breast; was it from mere fatigue? or was it from grief at having staked the world and lost it?

He raised his head, as on the former occasion, on feeling the carriage draw up, and cast around him the same vague look, which became so piercing when it was fixed upon a human face, or scanned the horizon—those two mysterious elements behind which danger might always be lurking.

“‘Where are we?’ he asked.

“‘At Villers-Cotterets, sire.’

“‘Good! eighteen leagues from Paris?’

“‘Yes, sire.’

“‘Go forward.’

“That same night Napoleon slept at the Elysée.

“It was exactly three months to the day since he had re-entered the Tuileries on his return from the Island of Elba.

Maria Edgeworth

“Only between March 20 and June 20 an abyss had opened which had swallowed up his fortunes.

“That abyss was Waterloo!”

CHAPTER XX

AFTER WATERLOO

MISS BERRY writes in her Journal of June 21 (1815): "Mr. Fazakerley brought the news of the great battle of the 18th in Flanders, between Buonaparte and Wellington, from which we have come out covered with glory, and gained a victory which one must hope will be decisive, as it has been bought with a great loss of blood. The news arrived in London at 11 o'clock at night by a carriage in which were seen the French eagles and the French standards. The carriage went to the Minister's house, and all the world was out of doors the best part of the night, asking news of their neighbours."

During the time that it was known throughout the nation that a great battle must be in progress, the state of public tension was almost unendurable. In one of our large Midland towns, we have been told by one who could remember the event, that crowds of people went far out on the London Road to get the first glimpse of the mail-coach that must bring tidings of success or defeat. When at last the coach appeared turning a distant corner of the road, behold, it was covered with green boughs in token of victory!

Maria Edgeworth

Another contemporary of those stirring times writes:

“I can just recollect the rejoicings for the peace after the Battle of Waterloo, though I must have been very little, as I was carried on my uncle’s shoulder about the streets to see the illuminations. . . . Every one seemed wild with joy at that time, and the names of everything were changed to Waterloo and Wellington wherever it was possible. The grand bridge was opened, and the universal colour was blue, down to my little new shoes.”*

Miss Edgeworth describes a Lord Mayor’s feast given at Drogheda in honour of the occasion. She says she hears that the assembled worthies partook of an incredible profusion of turtle soup, venison, geese, gurnets, &c., and that “in the centre of each long table there was placed a fine figure of Wellington and another of Blucher, made of sugared paste, in full coloured regimentals!”

The Allies took possession of Paris on July 6, and two days later Louis XVIII. re-entered the city and resumed the government. In the meantime Napoleon, finding all means of escape from * “Memories of Seventy Years,” edited by Mrs. Herbert Martin.

After Waterloo

France were cut off by the British cruisers, had given himself up a prisoner to the [captain of H.M.S. Bellerophon lying off Rochefort.

Miss Berry, in her journal of the 26th instant, remarks that she has just been reading in the papers "Captain Maitland's letter announcing the arrival of Napoleon Buonaparte upon his vessel [now] at Torbay. Wonderful event!" she exclaims, "whoever should have predicted this six months ago would have been thought fit for a madhouse!"

Many Englishmen were now hurrying to Paris. One of these writes: "The Champs Elysées presented a curious scene. It was covered with tents, horses picketed by thousands, innumerable troops (mostly British) of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, while the Place Louis XV., as well as the Gardens of the Tuileries, was crowded with English and foreign officers, well-dressed females, and Parisian beaux."

Wellington had no easy task, it seems, in curbing the desire of some of his Allies to commit acts of vengeance. "Blucher was for pulling down the column in the Place Vendôme and for blowing up the bridge of Jena." "In spite of all I could do," remarked the Duke to a friend, "he did make the attempt, even while, I believe, my sentinel was standing at one end of the bridge. But the Prussians had no experience in blowing up bridges.

Maria Edgeworth

. . . They made a hole in one of the pillars, but their powder blew out instead of up, and I believe hurt some of their own people.”*

A grand review of the Allied armies was held on July 24. “When the Highland regiments came up,” writes an eye-witness, “playing their bagpipes, the attention of the foreign princes seemed particularly directed to them from the novelty of their dresses. They played their favourite national airs as they passed. The band of the brave 42nd Regiment played ‘I’ll gang na mair to yon town.’ Sir Robert Macara, who commanded this corps in the battle of the 16th of June, was killed, with two-thirds of the officers and men, on that memorable day. It was melancholy to see how thin some of our regiments were.”†

The Duke of Wellington gave a State ball on August 18 in his residence, formerly the mansion of General Junot. This mansion is still to be seen standing in the Rue Boissy d’Anglas (No. 12), a street at the north-western corner of the Place de la Concorde. In 1815 it was known as the Rue des Champs Elysées. The house is conspicuous in having a trophy of arms sculptured beneath its central pediment. The Duke’s ball, owing to its * “Conversations with the Duke of Wellington,” by Earl Stanhope.

† “Paris during the interesting Month of July 1815,” by W. D. Fellowes.

RESIDENCE OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON IN PARIS

After Waterloo

extraordinary assemblage of celebrated guests of every description, must have been one of the most memorable gatherings on record. Happily a description of it exists, written by a gentleman who was himself one of the guests—Mr. James Simpson of Edinburgh.*

Mr. Simpson, after his own presentation, fell into the crowd behind the Duke to watch the arrival of the company. "As we gazed with intense curiosity at the door," he writes, "nobles, statesmen, generals, marshals, entered in rapid succession. Amidst a splendid display of [British] scarlet, mingled with rich foreign uniforms, was a profusion of the [white] uniform of Austria. . . . Diamonds blazed, and stars, crosses and ribbons were seen in every direction. 'Son Altesse le Prince de Benevento' was announced, and for the first time I saw close to me the celebrated Talleyrand. The wily politician's appearance surprised us. All seemed old-beau-like about him—a powdered old-fashioned gentleman. But we did not allow his countenance to go unscrutinised; and we saw, or thought we saw, in its very calm and mildness, the practised tranquillity of the prince of diplomatists.

"The Duke of Otranto, Fouché, soon followed, and we beheld the minister of police, the mover of the most tremendous engine of tyranny known to * See "Paris after Waterloo," by James Simpson.

Maria Edgeworth

modern times, [who] had exercised a sway of terror not exceeded by Napoleon's own.

“A bustling cortège of officers and aides-de-camp, with a veteran at their head, was explained by the announcement, ‘Son Altesse Sérénissime le Prince Blucher.’ On his entry there was a rush to gaze upon him, and a strong feeling experienced when the Duke of Wellington met him half-way down the salon, with a hearty shake of both hands. Walter Scott [who was present] was, I remember, moved to tears, and said to me, ‘Look at that—a few weeks ago these two men delivered Europe!’

“. . . In louder accents than usual we heard the following announcement: ‘Sa Majesté le Roi de Prusse, leurs Altesses Royales les Princes Royaux de Prusse, le Duc de Mecklembourg.’ The King entered with his splendid cortège. . . . The Prince of Orange followed, pale from his recent wound, and with his arm in a sling.

“. . . After all had assembled there was no figure present which commanded a larger share of attention than the Duke of Wellington. His person was new to the majority of the company . . . and there was an eagerness to get his form into the memory by studying it well. The most powerful sovereigns in Europe seemed to shrink beside this son of an English baron.

“One of the most striking and significant features of the scene,” continues the writer, “was the appearance of a portrait of Napoleon which had been recently finished for Junot; and was left leaning against the wall in one of the rooms . . . so that the fallen Emperor also seemed to form a part of the company. I saw the King of Prussia and one or two other personages whose fates had been strangely connected with his, stand for a few seconds before the portrait remarking on the fidelity of the likeness. At this time the original was on his passage to St. Helena, discrowned and a prisoner, while here was one of his palaces occupied in triumph by his conquerors . . . who were employing themselves in criticising his portrait, which was all that remained of him. Walter Scott observed to me that if he should venture in fiction to depict such a scene as was here presented to our eyes, with all its circumstances and associations, brilliant, noble and affecting, he should be charged with unpardonable exaggeration."

After Waterloo

A friend, writing to Miss Berry, from Paris, in August, says: "The French cut their jokes as usual. At the Duke of Wellington's ball the women talked of having danced sur le tombeau de la patrie; and they call the King, Louis l'inévitable. Mdlle. Mars reappears to-night, and Talma to-morrow. The most ridiculous, and the most characteristic, thing is a ballet at the Opera, and the excessive applause it has. The story is the Battle of Waterloo; the scene, Paris; the Imperial Guards beaten, come back and inform the National Guards of their disaster. A young lady hears that her lover is killed, but an English officer arrives with him, having saved his life, upon which tous danse à propos de tout, with white lilies; and plenty of Scotchmen are introduced, which puts the audience in raptures.”

Maria Edgeworth

“The Highlanders were quite a spectacle at Paris,” writes Simpson. “Their tartans, bonnets, and plumes were very much admired, and were imitated even by the ladies.”

Another Englishman in Paris, writing of a visit to the Tuileries, says: “The throne and canopy which Napoleon occupied but three weeks since, remain as he left them. The bedroom in which Louis sleeps is precisely as he found it. The letter N., with the imperial crown and eagle, are in almost every panel and corner of the palace.” On his pointing out this latter circumstance to a Frenchman present, the Frenchman with ready wit observed:

“Voyant partout au Palais des Tuileries des N., un plaisant répondit, il y a des N— mis partout.”*

It soon became generally known that the Emperor of Austria had laid claim to all the art treasures seized and carried away from his Italian States by * “Paris during the interesting Month of July 1815,” by W. D. Fellowes.

After Waterloo

Napoleon, and that the Pope had also laid claim to those taken away from the States of the Church. In the meantime other potentates had followed their example, and had sent Ministers to Paris to press their demands.

Just as these claims were, the act of restitution greatly irritated the Parisians, as is shown by the following letter from the Comtesse de Boigne.

“Our hero, the Duke of Wellington,” she writes, “took upon himself to carry out the spoliations demanded by the Allies. The English having no claims of the kind to make, he was sufficiently generous as to act on behalf of his allies and to take down the pictures from our museums with his own victorious hands. This expression is not mere rhetoric, but describes the actual fact. He was seen on a ladder himself setting the example to the workmen. When the horses from Venice were taken down from the arch of the Carrousel he spent a whole morning perched upon the arch superintending their removal.

“In the evening of that same day the Duke was present at a small reception given by Mme. de Duras to the King of Prussia. We could not conceal our indignation, but he made a joke of it and only laughed at us.”

At the time of the first entry of the Allies into Paris, in 1814, many of the art treasures seized by Napoleon as spoils of war were missing from the galleries, having been concealed by the Buonapartists. Maria Edgeworth, writing playfully on this subject to her aunt Mrs. Ruxton, remarked: "I daresay it has not escaped my aunt that the Venus de Medicis and the Apollo Belvedere are both missing together. I make no remarks. I hate scandal—at least I am not so fond of it as the lady of whom it was said she could not see the poker and tongs standing together without suspecting something wrong!"

Maria Edgeworth

The Rev. Edward Stanley, who visited Paris some months later, says:

"Where are the French? Nowhere—all is English; English carriages fill the streets; at the Play, at the Hotels, Restaurations, in short everywhere John Bull stalks incorporate. We are not popular. I suppose the sight of us must be grating to the feelings. We are like a blight on an apple-tree; we curl up their leaves and they writhe under our pressure.

"About the Tuileries, indeed, and here and there a few bien poudrés little old men, des bons papas du temps passé, may be seen, dry as mummies and as shrivelled, with their ribbons and Croix St. Louis, tottering about. They are good staunch Bourbons, ready, I daresay, to take the field en voiture; for once, when taunted by the Imperial officers for being too old and decrepit to lead troops, an honest emigrant Marquis replied that he did not see why he should not command a regiment and lead it on dans son cabriolet!"

After Waterloo

Sir Walter Scott, writing from Paris in September 1815, remarks: "France is at present the fabled giant, struggling, or rather lying supine, under the load of mountains, which have been precipitated on her; but she is not, and cannot be crushed. Remove the incumbent weight of 600,000 or 700,000 foreigners and she will soon stand upright—happy, if experience shall have taught her to exert her natural strength only for her own protection, and not for the annoyance of her neighbours. . . . She will soon recover the actual losses she has sustained, for never was there a soil so blessed by nature, or so rich in corn, wine, and oil, and in the animated industry of its inhabitants."

CHAPTER XXI

LITERARY DAUGHTERS

THE following is an unpublished letter from Miss Edgeworth to the Miss Berrys, dated Edgeworthstown, April 3, 1816 :*

“MY DEAR MISS BERRYS,—

“The very polite and kind attention you did me the honor to pay to a former note of introduction encourages me, as you see, to encroach upon your goodness and to venture to present to you another of my brothers—my eldest brother, Lovell Edgeworth—who has had so large a share of the evils of life that I cannot help wishing he should now enjoy as much as possible of its blessings, and of one of its best blessings, good society.

“He has been twelve † years a prisoner in France, detained by Buonaparte from the time of the breaking out of the war till the Allies entered Paris; so that he is a stranger almost in his own country, and

* From Mr. A. M. Broadley's collection of MSS.

† This is evidently a slip of the pen for “eleven.”

Literary Daughters

till the present moment ill-health has prevented him from fully enjoying the contrast of the society in London and that to which he was condemned in France. May I hope that you will do him the honor and the favour to let him spend one evening in the delightful society at your house?

“. . . We are all at this time happily engaged in reading a most entertaining book in the first page of which is written From A. and M. Berry. It was a present from the Miss Berrys to the late Mr. Malone, and, with all his valuable library, has come into the possession of his brother, Lord Sunderlin, who is our neighbour in this country. His Lordship has had the generosity—and I think it is great generosity—to trust this precious book to us. It is interleaved and furnished with prints of Mr. Malone's collecting of all the persons mentioned in the 'Reminiscences.'

“What a delightful companion Lord Orford must have been, and how much we are obliged to those who have preserved, in its full animation and elegance, the living spirit of his conversation. . . .

“Believe me,

“Y<sup>r</sup> obliged

“MARIA EDGEWORTH.”

The “Reminiscences” here mentioned were evidently Horace Walpole's “Reminiscences of the Courts of George I. and II.,” which, as the title

Maria Edgeworth

announces, "was written in 1788 for the amusement of Miss Mary and Miss Agnes Berry."

In the opening chapter of the work the author thus addresses the Miss Berrys:

"You were both so entertained with the old stories I told you one evening of the Courts of George the First and of his son . . . George the Second . . . and you expressed such wishes that I would commit these passages . . . to writing, that having no greater pleasure than to please you both, nor any more important nor laudable occupation, I will begin to satisfy . . . your curiosity. . . . [But] I may only be indulging myself, and consequently wander into many digressions for which you will not care a straw. . . . Patience, therefore, young ladies; . . . if you coin an old gentleman into narratives you must expect a good deal of alloy."

Miss Edgeworth, having read these words, would fully understand that it was the Miss Berrys' influence that had caused the "Reminiscences" to be given to the world; hence her prettily implied compliment to them.

Since the autumn of 1816 Mr. Edgeworth's health had been rapidly failing, but his interest in his daughter's writings remained as keen as ever. "He had expressed a wish to Maria," writes Mrs. Edgeworth, "that she should write a story as a companion to 'Harrington.'" She at once began to write her novel of "Ormond." "In all her anguish of mind at his state of health, she, by a wonderful effort of affection and genius, produced those gay and brilliant pages—some of the gayest and most brilliant she ever composed. . . . The admirable characters of King Corny and Sir Ulick O’Shane, and all the wonderful scenes full of wit, humour and feeling, were written in an agony of anxiety, with trembling hand and tearful eyes. As she finished chapter after chapter, she read them out—the whole family assembling in her father’s room to listen to them.”

Literary Daughters

On June 13, 1817, Mr. Edgeworth died.

Maria’s love of her father is well known. It influenced her whole life.

It is a curious circumstance that two celebrated contemporary authoresses—women differing widely in character from Miss Edgeworth—were equally conspicuous for their enthusiastic devotion to their fathers, namely, Mme. de Staël and Mary Russell Mitford. Mme. de Staël’s devotion to the great Necker, and her pride in being his daughter, transpire continually in her writings; while Miss Mitford’s ardent love is evinced as often for “her dear Papa” (in spite of all his shortcomings), whom she styles “her chief spoiler in childhood” and “her pleasantest companion at all times”; though she admits that “Mamma is my best friend.”

A saying of Mme. de Staël’s when a child, curiously enough, forms a parallel to this. Having been reproved by her mother for some fault, she was found by a friend in tears. "Never mind," said her consoler, "your father will soon make you happy again." To which the little girl replied: "Papa thinks of my present pleasure, but Mamma of my future good."

Maria Edgeworth

The author of "Our Village" resembled Miss Edgeworth in another respect—her fondness for needlework—"that most effectual sedative," as she terms it, "that grand soother and composer of woman's distress"; and, as Miss Edgeworth calls it, "that valuable resource, sovereign against the root of all evil—an antidote both to love in idleness and hate in idleness."

But the authoress of "Corinne" was far from sharing in this taste. "I do not think," writes the Comtesse de Boigne, "that such a thing as a needle was to be found throughout the whole château of Coppet."

Maria, writing in 1805 to her brother Henry (then in Edinburgh) about a piece of her own needlework, says: "The worked sleeves are for Mrs. Stewart, and you are to offer them to her. . . . If Mrs. Stewart should begin to say, 'O! it is a pity Miss Edgeworth should spend her time in such work!' please to interrupt her speech, though that is very rude, and tell her that I like work very much, and that I have only done this at odd times, after breakfast you know, when my father reads out Pope's 'Homer,' or when there are long sittings, when it is much more agreeable to move one's fingers than to have to sit with hands crossed or clasped immovably. I by no means accede to the doctrine that ladies cannot attend to anything else when they are working. . . . Does not Dr. Darwin show that certain habitual motions go on without interrupting trains of thought? And do not common sense and experience, whom I respect even above Dr. Darwin, show the same thing?"

Literary Daughters

Maria considered Dr. Darwin, we are told, not only to be "a first-rate genius, but one of the most benevolent as well as wittiest of men." It seems to us that he must have been the prototype for the Dr. X. who appears in "Belinda," and also in other tales by Maria, and who is always the mouthpiece of much wisdom and dry humour.

We are tempted to introduce here an amusing passage in a letter written at Edgeworthstown.

Maria, having been indisposed, was left at home for rest and quiet while her family went to an evening party. During their absence she had been so happily engaged in writing to her aunt Mrs. Ruxton that she had altogether forgotten the passage of time.

"Here comes the carriage rolling round," she concludes. "I feel guilty, what will my mother say to me, so long a letter at this time of night?"

Maria Edgeworth

Yours affectionately, in all the haste of guilt, conscience-stricken; that is found out. No—all safe, all innocent—because not found out! Finis. By the Author of ‘Moral Tales’ and ‘Practical Education.’”

CHAPTER XXII

THE "MANUSCRIT DE SAINTE-HÉLÈNE"

IN the winter of the year 1817 the "Manuscrit de Sainte-Hélène," published by Murray, suddenly made its appearance, creating a widespread sensation.

Miss Edgeworth writes to a relative: "I agree with you in thinking the 'MS. de Sainte-Hélène' a magnificent performance. My father was strongly of opinion that it was not written by Buonaparte himself, and he grounded his opinion chiefly upon the passages relative to the Duc d'Enghien: c'était plus qu'un crime, c'était une faute. But it may be observed in the Buonaparte system of morality which runs through the book, nothing is considered what we call a crime unless it be what he allows to be a fault. . . . Le cachet de Buonaparte is as difficult to imitate as le cachet de Voltaire. I know of but three people in Europe who could have written it: Madame de Staël, Talleyrand, or M. Dumont. Madame de Staël, though she has the ability, could not have got so plainly and shortly through it. Talleyrand has l'esprit comme un démon, but he could not, for the soul of him, have refused himself a little more wit and wickedness. Dumont has not enough audacity of mind."

Maria Edgeworth

In a letter from John Murray to Lord Byron dated March 20, 1817, the writer says: "I have just received, in a way perfectly unaccountable, a MS. from St. Helena—with not one word. I suppose it to be originally written by Buonaparte or his agents. . . . I call it therefore simply Manuscrit venu de S<sup>te</sup> Hélène d'une manière inconnue."* Shortly after its appearance the "Manuscrit" was translated into English and published in New York. The work opens with the following words:

"My life has been so wonderful that the admirers of my greatness have imagined that even my infancy must have been extraordinary. They were mistaken. The first years of my life were marked by no uncommon circumstances. I was an obstinate and inquisitive child. My early education was as wretched as everything else in Corsica. I acquired the French language with facility from the officers of the garrison with whom I spent my time.

"I succeeded in whatever I undertook because I willed it. My resolution was strong and my character decided. I never hesitated, which has given me an advantage over the rest of mankind.

* "Memoir and Correspondence of the late Mr. John Murray," by S. Smiles.

The "Manuscrit de Sainte-Hélène"

Besides, the will depends upon the constitution of the individual. Every one is not master of his determination.

"My intellectual character made me hate illusions. I have always discerned the truth at a single glance. This is the reason why I have always penetrated the bottom of things with more facility than others. The world has been seen by me such as it is, not such as it ought to be. So also I have not resembled any one. I have been by nature an isolated being."

The Comtesse de Boigne gives us an interesting account of the arrival in Paris of the "MS. de Sainte-Hélène."

She herself was fairly puzzled, she tells us, as to its authenticity, but fearing in any case that it might act as a bombshell, in the midst of party strife, she hid her early copy out of sight and maintained a discreet silence on the subject. Presently she received an invitation from her Royalist friend, Mme. de Duras, to spend an evening at her house. "There I found," she writes, "an assemblage of about fifty people: a table placed in their midst with lighted candles and the usual glass of water for a reader. But from what book was the reading to be given?—The 'MS. de Sainte-Hélène'!"

The following evening the same scene was repeated at the house of the Duchesse d'Escars, one of the chief ladies of the Court of Louis XVIII.

"I was never present," she continues, "at a

Maria Edgeworth

reading of the kind before a gathering of Imperialists; but, to judge by the effect produced in our Bourbonist salons, it must have greatly stirred their hearts and sharpened anew their former animosities and regrets.

“Doubt of the authenticity of the manuscript soon became impossible, for those who had lived in the closest connection with the Emperor were the most positive in declaring it to be the work of his hand.

“M. de Fontanes recognised every phrase as his; M. Molé could hear the very sound of his voice in uttering the words; M. de Talleyrand could see him in the act of writing them down. Marshal Marmont discovered expressions belonging to his and Napoleon’s youthful days which the Emperor alone could have made use of; and all were equally electrified by this direct communication from the great man. No work in my time,” remarks the Comtesse, “ever created such a sensation.”

In spite, however, of the mass of evidence in favour of its genuineness, the “MS. de Sainte-Hélène” proved, after all, to be an imposture. Napoleon denied its authorship; and the excitement gradually died away.

Many years elapsed, it seems, before it became known that the real author was a certain M. Lullin de Châteauevieux, a Swiss writer, known, not for any work of surprising genius dealing with men and manners, but for his works on agriculture!

CHAPTER XXIII

A HAMPSTEAD POETESS

IN the autumn of 1818 Maria Edgeworth paid a visit to Joanna Baillie and her sister, who were living in the "village of Hampstead."

This place enjoyed a complete life of its own in those days, being connected with the great noisy city only by a highway which descended between green fields, with here and there some pleasant country-houses. The quaint High Street climbing towards the Heath contained private residences as well as shops. In the shops business was conducted in a dignified and leisurely style even to a much later date, and customers could catch glimpses through the back windows of sloping, sunny gardens, with the "sister hill of Highgate" in the distance.

Miss Edgeworth, who had been paying a visit at Epping, must have approached Hampstead from this "sister hill" before driving along the summit of the Heath, with its magnificent view that "smiles, miles and miles."

Maria Edgeworth

Writing from Hampstead, she says: "We had a delightful drive here yesterday from Epping, through various cheerful villages, and on Hampstead Heath numbers of riding-parties, children looking so happy. At one house we saw a group of white-robed ladies, mothers, aunts, and sisters, I am sure, just come out of their house without hat or bonnet, to see the first performance of a little urchin on a little long-tailed pony under a row of shady trees.

"Joanna Baillie and her sister came running down their little flagged walk to welcome us."

Bolton House, the Baillies' dwelling-place, on Windmill Hill, is still to be seen, with its dark brick walls and white window-frames, its "flagged walk" and sheltering elms, as Maria saw them ninety years ago.

"Both Joanna and her sister have such agreeable and new conversation," writes Maria, "not old trumpery literature over again, and reviews, but new circumstances worth telling, à propos to every subject that is touched upon: frank observations on character, without either ill-nature or the fear of committing themselves; no blue-stocking tittle-tattle, or habits of worshipping or being worshipped: domestic, affectionate, good to live with, and without fussing continually, doing what is most obliging, and whatever makes us feel most at home."

BOLTON HOUSE

A Hampstead Poetess

How the pleasant chat must have flowed in the panelled parlour of Bolton House, and how often the name of Walter Scott must have been mentioned! It was but in the spring of this same year (1818) that Maria had received a letter from him in which he had said:

“You have had a merit—transcendent in my eyes—of raising your national character in the scale of public estimation, and making the rest of the British Empire acquainted with the peculiar and interesting character of a people too long neglected and too severely oppressed.

“. . . I do not rate the unknown author of our Scottish tales,” he goes on to say, “so high as to place him in the same rank either of merit or utility, and yet I think highly of many of his works, and expect to be gratified by those which are still promised from the same abundant and concealed source.”*

The warm and intimate friendship that existed between Walter Scott and Joanna Baillie began in the year 1806, when we are told he first met the “poetess of Hampstead,” of whose “Plays on the Passions” he was an enthusiastic admirer. When in later years Lockhart asked Miss Baillie what impression he had made upon her on that occasion, she answered: “I was at first a little * “Familiar Letters of Sir Walter Scott,” edited by David Douglas, 1894.

Maria Edgeworth

disappointed, for I was fresh from the 'Lay' and had pictured to myself an ideal elegance and refinement of feature; but I said to myself, if I had been in a crowd, and at a loss what to do, I should have fixed upon that face among a thousand, as the sure index of the benevolence and the shrewdness that would and could help me in my strait. We had not talked long, however, before I saw in the expressive play of his countenance far more even of elegance and refinement than I had missed in its mere lines."

In addition to her power of composing tragic dramas, Joanna Baillie "possessed a lyric vein." "She was endowed with that romantic touch which more than anything else made her genius akin to Scott's."* Of her lyrics the most widely known is the Outlaws' Chorus in the play of Orra, which the reader may remember as a part-song set to stirring music by Bishop. We are tempted to give the stanzas.

The chough and crow to roost are gone,
The owl sits on the tree,
The hushed wind wails with feeble moan,
Like infant charity;
The wild fire dances on the fen,
The red star sheds its ray:
Uprouse ye, then, my merry men,
It is our op'ning day.

* See Canon Ainger on Joanna Baillie.

THE ENTRANCE PASSAGE

A Hampstead Poetess

Both child and nurse are fast asleep,
And closed is every flower,
And winking tapers faintly peep
High from my lady's bower ;
Bewildered hinds, with shortened ken,
Shrink on their murky way :
Uprouse ye, then, my merry men,
It is our op'ning day.

Nor board nor garner own we now,
Nor roof nor latchèd door,
Nor kind mate bound by holy vow
To bless a good man's store ;
Noon lulls us in a gloomy den,
And night is grown our day :
Uprouse ye, then, my merry men,
And use it as ye may.

When Orra appeared before the public in the autumn of 1811 Scott was engaged in composing his "Rokeby." "When I had read Orra twice to myself," he writes to Joanna, "Terry read it over to us a third time aloud, and I have seldom seen a little circle so much affected as during the whole fifth act. . . .

"Yet I have a great quarrel with this beautiful drama," he continues, "for you must know you have utterly destroyed a song of mine precisely in the turn of your outlaws' ditty, and sung by persons in somewhat the same situation. I took out my unfortunate manuscript to look at it ; but alas ! it was the encounter of the iron and the earthen pitchers in the fable. I was clearly sunk, and the potsherds not worth gathering up."

Maria Edgeworth

In fact, Scott at once remodelled his own song; and it is a curious circumstance that some years later, when "Guy Mannering" was dramatised and produced at Covent Garden Theatre, it was Joanna Baillie's "Chough and Crow" that was introduced as the gipsies' song, in preference to Scott's own composition.

Miss Lucy Aikin, a niece of Mrs. Barbauld, who knew the Miss Baillies well, writes of Joanna: "No one could have taken her for a married woman. An innocent maiden grace hovered over her to the end of old age. It was one of her peculiar charms. . . . If ever there were human creature 'pure to the last recesses of the soul,' it was surely this meek, this pious, this noble-minded and nobly gifted woman."

Mrs. Barbauld writes, after spending a few days with the Miss Baillies: "One should be, as I was, beneath their roof to know all their merit. Their house is one of the best ordered I know. They have all manner of attentions for their friends. . . . Joanna is as clever in furnishing a room or in arranging a party as in writing plays."

A pleasant recollection of these two ladies in their old-world home is still retained by a relative of the present writer. She was sent with her sister to Bolton House to leave a parcel for the Miss Baillies, who were friends of their parents. Joanna saw the children from an upper window, and came out to welcome them and to invite them to come in. The ladies had just finished breakfast, and on the table there was some white currant jelly, which the children much appreciated. When the jelly was eaten Joanna fetched a bowl of water, that the little sticky fingers might be washed. She refilled it for the second little girl, remarking, "You mustn't both wash your hands in the same water, or you will quarrel before nightfall."

A Hampstead Poetess

THE DINING-PARLOUR

We learn that the authoress's study was on the first floor, behind the best parlour.

Mrs. Le Breton, in her interesting "Memories

Maria Edgeworth

of Seventy Years," tells us that "soon after the publication of the last volume of the 'Plays of the

JOANNA BAILLIE'S STUDY

Passions,' some of the Baillies' friends arranged for a Reading of one of them by an actress in the Holly Bush Assembly Rooms. These Rooms are still to be seen in a quaint wooden building, divided by only a small green from the Baillies' house. The large room on the first floor where the reading took place was used formerly as a ball-room, and though serving other purposes now, it still retains its 'musicians' gallery,' its elegant fluted pilasters and its tall recessed windows."

A Hampstead Poetess

Mrs. Bartley, who read the play, "performed her task with much effect and feeling. The large room was quite full. The two dear old ladies dressed alike in grey silk with pretty lace caps, came quietly in with the rest, Mrs. Joanna walking meekly behind her elder sister. Her friends understood her feelings too well to distress her by any public recognition of her presence, though she accepted their congratulations at the end with evident pleasure and simple dignity. . . .

"She told us in her quiet droll way that some of her old friends in Scotland were shocked at the line of writing she had taken to, and said she had seen in a letter from one—'Have ye heard that Jocky Baillie has taken to the public line?'"

CHAPTER XXIV

AN HONOURED WRITER

MISS EDGEWORTH occasionally stayed with other friends at Hampstead beside the Baillies—these were a Mr. and Mrs. Carr and their family, who lived at Maryon Hall, which stands at the top of Frogmal Lane. “Frogmal, delicious Frogmal!” as Maria calls it. The house recently divided into two, was surrounded by large and beautiful grounds in Maria’s day, which lay upon the slope of the hill.

It was about three years later than the visit to Bolton House and in mid-winter that Miss Edgeworth paid a visit to the Carrs. She was accompanied by her two young sisters, Fanny and Harriet.

“We have been enjoying in this family,” she writes, “every delight which affection and cultivated tastes, and cheerful tempers can bestow. . . .

“New Year’s Day was Mr. and Mrs. Carr’s wedding-day, and it was kept as it always is, with family rejoicings. Dr. Holland and Joanna Baillie and Miss Mulso, an intimate friend (a niece of Mrs. Chapone's) dined here, which with the whole family and ourselves made a party of twenty. Mr. Carr gave many toasts; some so affectionate they made the tears roll down the cheeks of his children.

An Honoured Writer

“In the evening, a merry dance, in which Joanna and her sister joined, and then, as agreed upon at a given signal, we all ran up to our rooms and dressed in different characters. We did not know what the others were to be, but Fanny was a nun in a white muslin veil and drapery over her black gown—dressed in a moment, and I fell to decking Harriet, a pert travelled young lady, just returned from Paris, in the height of the fashion; feathers of all colours, gold diadem, a profusion of artificial flowers, a nosegay of vast size, rose-coloured gauze dress, darkened eyebrows and ringlets of dark hair which so completely altered her that no creature guessed who she was till Mrs. Carr, at last, knew her by her likeness to her mother; she supported her character with great spirit.

“I was an Irish nurse in a red cloak come all the way from Killogonsawee, ‘for my two childer that left me last year for foreign parts.’ Little Francis was Triptolemus in the ‘Pirate,’ an excellent figure, and Mrs. Carr, his sister Baby; Isabella, an old lady in an old-fashioned dress, and Laura as her daughter in a court dress and powder;

Maria Edgeworth

Anna, a French troubadour singing beautifully and speaking French perfectly ; William, the youngest son, a half-pay officer, king of the coffee-house ; Tom, a famous London black beggar, Billy Waters, with a wooden leg ; Morton, Meg Merrilies ; Dr.

THE DRAWING-ROOM, MARYON HALL

An Honoured Writer

Lushington, a housemaid; Miss Mulso, an English ballad-singer; Mr. Burrell (I forgot to mention him, an old family friend at dinner), as a Spanish gentleman, Don Pedro Velasquez de Tordesillas; very good ruff and feathers, but much wanting a sword when the wooden-legged black trod on his toes. In the scuffle of dressing, for which only ten minutes were allowed, no sword could be found.

“From the quickness of preparation, and our all being a family party, this little masquerade went off remarkably well.”

When Miss Edgeworth visited the Baillies in 1818, Mrs. Barbauld had ceased to be a resident in Hampstead, though she was still connected with the place, as her near relatives the Aikins dwelt there from time to time, occupying a house, No. 8 Church Row. Maria, however, visited Mrs. Barbauld at Stoke Newington and remarks in a letter that she was “very kind and agreeable.”

The two authoresses had been in correspondence with each other as early as the year 1810, when Mrs. Barbauld was preparing her collected edition of British Novelists, and desired to include in the series the tales of “Belinda” and “Griselda.” She wrote to Miss Edgeworth on this occasion: “I may not to you expatiate on the variety, the invention, the spirit ever new and ever charming of your various publications, but I may congratulate you on having so much power and so much will to impress the heart with virtuous feelings, and by those modes of writing which are generally managed so as to enfeeble the mind, to gird it up for the real business and duties of life."

Maria Edgeworth

Maria Edgeworth in her turn warmly admired Mrs. Barbauld's works. She writes: "Elegance and strength—qualities rarely uniting without injury to each other, combine most perfectly in her style, and this rare combination, added to their classical purity, form, perhaps, the distinguishing characteristics of her writings."

Mrs. Barbauld, the reader may remember, had first become known as a writer when, in conjunction with her brother Dr. Aikin, she wrote the attractive stories of the "Evenings at Home." We owe to her pen, it seems, the little plays of Alfred the Great in the Neatherd's Hut and King Canute rebuking the flattery of his Courtiers. Canon Ainger, describing his childish memories of their representation, remarks: "How well does the present writer recall the feeding of his nascent histrionic ambitions in the title-rôles of these two engaging dramas, and how the relentless ocean was represented by a large blue dust-cloth, beneath which two other denizens of the nursery persistently rolled to produced the effect of the stormy billows."

In the year 1811, a period of deep gloom, when Napoleon was all-powerful on the Continent and

8 CHURCH ROW

ANNA LETITIA BARBAULD

An Honoured Writer

when England stood alone to oppose him, Mrs. Barbauld wrote a striking poem entitled "1811." Her verses reflected not only the wide-spread public depression of the time, but also, unconsciously, her own personal state of melancholy upon the death of her husband. The poem was much censured by many persons, who considered it as discouraging to the nation in a time of great difficulty. This provoked "a very coarse review," we are told, in the Quarterly.

Miss Edgeworth wrote to Mrs. Barbauld: "I cannot describe to you the indignation, or rather the disgust, that we felt at the manner in which you are treated in the Quarterly Review: so ungentleman-like, so unjust, so insolent a review I never read. My father and I in the moment of provocation snatched up our pens to answer it, but a minute's reflection convinced us that silent contempt is the best answer—that we should not suppose it possible that it can hurt anybody with the generous British public, but the reviewers themselves. . . . The public, the public will do you justice!"

Crabb Robinson, who was a friend of Mrs. Barbauld, thus describes her personal appearance in middle life: "She bore the remains of great personal beauty. She had a brilliant complexion, light hair, blue eyes, a small and elegant figure, and her manners were very agreeable with something of the generation then departing." He writes in later years: "It was after her death that Lucy Aikin published Mrs. Barbauld's works, of which I gave a copy to Miss Wordsworth. Among the poems is a stanza on 'Life,' written in extreme old age. . . . It was long after I gave these works to Miss Wordsworth that her brother said, 'Repeat me that stanza by Mrs. Barbauld.' I did so. He made me repeat it again; and so he learnt it by heart. He was at the time walking in his sitting-room at Rydal, with his hands behind him, and I heard him mutter to himself, 'I am not in the habit of grudging people their good things, but I wish I had written those lines.'"

Maria Edgeworth

The poem referred to, that begins with the words—

Life, I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part, is happily well known, being included in our principal collections of lyric poetry.

We should like to insert here some verses written in a lighter vein, bearing the title:

LINES PLACED OVER A CHIMNEY-PIECE

Surly Winter, come not here ;
Bluster in thy proper sphere :
Howl along the naked plain,
There exert thy joyless reign ;
Triumph o'er the withered flower,
The leafless shrub, the ruined bower ;
But our cottage come not near ;—
Other springs inhabit here,

An Honoured Writer

Other sunshine decks our board,
Than the niggard skies afford.
Gloomy Winter, hence ! away !
Love and Fancy scorn thy sway ;
Love and Joy, and friendly Mirth,
Shall bless this roof, these walls, this hearth.
The rigour of the year controul,
And thaw the winter in the soul.

CHAPTER XXV

JOURNEYING HERE AND THERE

IN the early part of the year 1819, Maria Edgeworth paid some visits to various friends residing in the English provinces.

She writes to Mrs. Ruxton, her "dearest, kindest, and most polite of Aunts" as she calls her, on January 20:

"I see my little dog on your lap, and feel your hand patting his head, and hear your voice telling him that it is for Maria's sake he is there. I wish I was in his place, or at least on the sofa beside you at this moment, that I might, in five minutes, tell you more than my letters could tell you in five hours.

"I have scarcely yet recovered from the joy of having Fanny actually with me, and with me just in time to go to Trentham, on which I had set my foolish heart. We met her at Lichfield. . . .

"When Honora and I had Fanny in the chaise to ourselves, ye gods! how we did talk! We arrived at Trentham by moonlight, and could only just see outlines of wood and hills; silver light upon the broad water, and cheerful lights in the front of a large house, with wide open hall door. Nothing could be more polite and cordial than the reception given to us by Lady Stafford, and by her good-natured, nobleman-like lord.

Journeying Here and There

“During our whole visit what particularly pleased me was the manner in which they treated my sisters: not as appendages to an authoress, not as young ladies merely permitted, or to fill up as personnages muets in society; on the contrary, Lady Stafford conversed with them a great deal, and repeatedly took opportunities of expressing to me how much she liked and valued them for their own sake. ‘That sister Fanny of yours has a most intelligent countenance; she is much more than pretty. . . . They have both been admirably well educated.’ Then she spoke in the handsomest manner of my father—‘a master mind: even in the short time I saw him, that was apparent to me. . . .’

“I forgot to tell you that Lady Harrowby and her daughter were at Trentham, and an exquisite, or tiptop dandy, Mr. Standish. . . . The morning after Mr. Standish’s arrival, Lady Stafford’s maid told her that she and all the ladies’-maids had been taken by his gentleman to see his toilette—‘which, I assure you, my lady, is the thing best worth seeing in this house, all of gilt plate, and I wish my lady you had such a dressing-box.'

Maria Edgeworth

"Though an exquisite, Mr. Standish is clever, entertaining and agreeable. One day that he sat beside me at dinner, we had a delightful battledore and shuttlecock conversation from grave to gay as quick as your heart could wish: from l'Almanac des Gourmands and Le respectable porc to Dorri-forth and the 'Simple Story.'"

By the month of March the Edgeworths had reached London, and were visiting Lady Elizabeth Whitbread at Kensington Gore.

Among their many engagements in town Maria mentions "Three breakfasts at dear Mrs. Marcet's—the first quite private, the second literary, very agreeable: Dr. Holland, Mr. Wishaw, Captain Beaufort, Mr. Mallet, Lady Yonge; third, Mr. Mill—British India—was the chief figurant; not the least of a figurant, though excellent in sense and benevolence.

"Twice at Mr. Wilberforce's; he lives next door to Lady Elizabeth Whitbread; there we met Mr Buxton—admirable facts from him about Newgate and Spitalfields weavers. . . . I was very sorry to learn that Mrs. Fry, that angel woman, was very ill."

Meeting Mrs. Somerville later on, Miss Edgeworth thus describes her: "Mrs. Somerville is the lady whom La Place mentions as the only woman in England who understands his works. She draws beautifully; and while her head is among the stars, her feet are firm upon the earth."

Journeying Here and There

"On St. Patrick's Day," continues Maria, "by appointment to the Duchess of Wellington; nothing could be more like Kitty Pakenham; a plate of shamrocks on the table, and as she came forward to meet me she gave a bunch to me, pressing my hand and saying in a low voice, with her sweet smile, 'Vous en êtes digne.'

"Presently the conversation turning upon Mme. de Staël, the Duchess said she had purposely avoided being acquainted with her in England, not knowing how she might be received by the Bourbons, to whom the Duchess was to be Ambassador. She found that Madame de Staël was well received at the Bourbon Court and consequently she must be received at the Duke of Wellington's. Madame de Staël arrived, and, walking up in full assembly to the Duchess, with the fire of indignation flashing in her eyes:

"'Eh! Madame la Duchesse, vous ne voulez pas donc faire ma connaissance en Angleterre!'

"'Non, Madame, je ne le voulais pas.'

"'Eh! comment, Madame? Pourquoi donc?'

"'C'est que je vous craignais, Madame.'

"'Vous me craignez, Madame la Duchesse?'

"'Non, Madame, je ne vous crains plus.'

Maria Edgeworth

“Madame de Staël threw her arms round her, ‘Ah! je vous adore!’”

In one of her earlier letters Miss Edgeworth says: “Madame de Staël calls Blenheim ‘a magnificent tomb; splendour without and the death-like silence of ennui within.’ She says she is very proud of having made the Duke of Marlborough speak four words. At the moment she was announced he was distinctly heard to say, ‘Let me go away.’”

The celebrated taciturnity of this Duke might well have formed the subject of such another pamphlet as Maria alludes to in one of her works, “Réponse au silence de M. de la Motte.”

Writing at this time of the style of French governess in vogue, namely, the ultra-French, she says: “A lady governess of this party and one of the Orleans or Libéral party met and came to high words, till all was calmed by the timely display of a ball-dress trimmed with roses alternately red and white—‘Garniture aux préjugés vaincus!’”

“Remember,” she writes when hurriedly finishing a letter, “that I don’t forget to tell you of Lady Bredalbane having been left in her carriage fast asleep, and rolled into the coach-house of an hotel at Florence and nobody missing her for some time, and how they went to look for her, and how ever so many carriages had been rolled in after hers, and how she wakened, and—— I must sign and seal!”

Journeying Here and There

We are tempted to insert here passages from two letters of Maria Edgeworth, although they were written at a later date.

The first is addressed to Lady Holland after enjoying happy intercourse in England with the Rev. Sydney Smith, Lady Holland's father. Miss Edgeworth begins her letter by remarking playfully that she wishes an Irish bishopric could be forced upon him so that he would be obliged to live in Ireland.

“He would see,” she writes, “in the twinkling of an eye (such an eye as his) all our manifold grievances up and down the country. . . . One letter from Sydney Smith on the affairs of Ireland, with his name to it and, after having been there, would do more for us than his letters did for America and England; a bold assertion you will say, and so it is; but I calculate that Pat is a far better subject for wit than Jonathan. It only plays round Jonathan's head, but it goes to Pat's heart, to the very bottom of his heart, where he loves it; and he don't care whether it is for or against him, so that it is real wit and fun.

“Now Pat would dote upon your father, and kiss the rod with all his soul he would—the lash just lifted—when he'd see the laugh on the face, the kind smile, that would tell him it was all for his good. Your father would lead Pat (for he'd never drive him) to the world's end, and may be to common sense at the end."*

Maria Edgeworth

The second letter was written when Maria was making a little tour in Connemara and the neighbouring country, in company with her friends Sir Culling and Lady Smith. The latter was a daughter of Mrs. Carr of Hampstead, and must have been one of the masqueraders at the family fête.

"Smugglers and caves," she writes, "and murders and mermaids, and duels and banshees and fairies were all mingled together in my early associations with Connemara and Dick Martin—'Hair-trigger Dick'—who cared so little for his own life, or the life of man, and so much for the life of animals; who fought more duels than any man of even his 'Blue-blaze-devil' day, and who brought the Bill into Parliament for preventing cruelty to animals; henceforward changing his cognomen from 'Hair-trigger Dick' to 'Humanity Martin.'"

The party travelled in a large family coach and four.

"The first bad step we came to," writes Miss Edgeworth, "was indeed a slough. . . . The horses, the moment they set their feet upon it, sank up to their knees, and were whipped and spurred, and * See "Memoirs of the Rev. Sydney Smith," by his daughter, Lady Holland.

Journeying Here and There

they struggled and floundered and the carriage, as we inside passengers felt, sank and sank. Sir Culling was very brave and got down to help. The postillions leaped off, and, bridles in hand, gained the shore, and by dint of tugging and whipping and hallooing, and dragging of men and boys, who followed, we were got out and were on the other side.

“Further on we might fare worse from what we could learn, so in some commotion we got out and said we would rather walk. When we came to the next bad step the horses, seeing it was a slough like the first, absolutely refused to set foot upon it . . . so they were taken off and left to look on, while by force of arms the carriage was to be got over by men and boys, who, shouting, gathered from all sides; from mountain paths down which they poured, and from fields where they had been at work or loitering. . . . ‘This heavy carriage! sure it was impossible, but sure they might do it,’ . . . and in spite of all remonstrance about breaking the pole . . . they seized . . . the carriage, and standing and jumping from stone to stone, or any tuft of bog that could bear them . . . they, I cannot tell you how, dragged, pushed and screamed the carriage over.

“Sir Culling got over his way, and Lady Smith would not be carried, but leaping and assisted by men’s arms and shouts, she got to the other side.

Maria Edgeworth

A great giant of the name of Alick Burke took me up in his arms as he might a child or a doll, and proceeded to carry me over—while I, exceedingly frightened and exceedingly civil and . . . (very like Rory in his dream on the eagle's back in his journey to the moon), kept alternately flattering my giant and praying, 'Sir, sir, pray set me down; do let me down now, sir, pray.'

“‘Be asy, be quite, can't you, dear, and I'll carry you over to the other side safely, all in good time,' floundering as he went.

“‘Thank you, sir, thank you. Now sir, now set me down, if you will be so very good, on the bank.'

“Just as we reached the bank he stumbled and sank knee-deep, but threw me, as he would a sack, to shore, and the moment I felt myself on terra firma I got up and ran off and never looked back, trusting that my giant knew his own business; and so he did, and all dirt and bog-water was beside me again in a trice. 'Did not I carry you over well, my lady? Oh, it's I am used to it!'"

CHAPTER XXVI

IN PARIS AGAIN

MISS EDGEWORTH had long cherished a desire to revisit Paris, and to do so in company with two of her younger sisters. But there were difficulties in the way. She had been engaged ever since her father's death in editing his Memoirs and in adding to them a volume of her own writing, and this work she wished to finish before leaving home. In the course of the month of February 1820, news was received of the assassination of the Duc de Berri, to which Maria alludes in the following unpublished letter to her friend Dr. Holland, dated February 25: "If there be not an explosion, or a revolution in Paris before the end of next month, I shall be there with two of my sisters, Fanny and Harriet, in the second week in April—provided always that Hunter finishes printing my father's Memoirs by that time. Till I have corrected the last proof-sheet I shall never stir. I do not speak to you of my anxiety about that book, it is too deep down in my mind to talk much about."

Maria Edgeworth

The book was finished by the time specified, and public affairs in France becoming less ominous the three travellers started from Edgeworthstown for Paris on April 3.

Steamboats, we are told, had only begun to ply between Dublin and Holyhead in 1819, and Maria's first experience of a steamboat was in crossing the Irish Channel. She disliked the jigging motion, which she said was "like the shake felt in a carriage when a pig is scratching himself against the hind wheel, while waiting at an Irish inn door."

After breaking their journey at various places the party reached Calais on April 22. Miss Edgeworth writes the following day from Dessin's Hotel :

"We arrived here last night at half-past seven—Fanny and Harriet sat on deck; I sat in Mrs. Moilliet's carriage. We spent Saturday at Dover with them; they go on now direct to Geneva."

Her next letter is from Paris. It is dated "Place du Palais Bourbon, April 29."

"One moment of reward," she writes, "for two days of indescribable hurry, I have at this quiet interval after breakfast, and I seize it to tell you that Fanny is quite well; so far for health. For beauty, I have only to say that I am told by everybody that my sisters are lovely in English and charmante in French. Last night was their début

A CORNER OF THE PLACE DU PALAIS BOURBON

In Paris Again

at Lady Granard's—a large assembly of all manner of lords, ladies, counts, countesses, princes and princesses, French, Polish and Italian; Marmont and Humboldt were there. I was told by several persons of rank and taste . . . that my sisters' dress, the grand affair at Paris, was perfection, and I believed it!

“May 3.—On Sunday we went with the Countess de Salis and the Baronne de Salis, who is also Chanoinesse, but goes into the world in roses and pink ribbons nevertheless, and is very agreeable moreover, and M. le Baron, an Officer in the Swiss Guards, an old bachelor, to St. Sulpice, to hear M. Fressenus: he preached . . . with intolerable monotony of thumping eloquence, against les Libéraux, Rousseau, &c.; it seemed to me old stuff, ill-embroidered, but it was much applauded. . . .

“After church a visit to Madame de Pastoret. . . . Fanny and Harriet were delighted with the beauty of the house till they saw her and then nothing could be thought of but her manner and conversation. . . . She is little changed.”

M. de Pastoret had been created a peer of France under the Restoration, and now, in 1820, had just been made Vice-President of the Chambers.

“After a ball at the Polish Countess Orłowski's,” continues Maria, “where Fanny and Harriet were delighted with the children's dancing . . . I went with the Count and Countess de Salis, and la

Maria Edgeworth

Baronne . . . to the Duchesse d'Escars'; who receives for the King at the Tuileries . . . (I was told that the first time it must be without my sisters). [We] mounted a staircase of one hundred and forty steps—I thought the Count's knees would have failed while I leaned on his arm; my own ached.

“A long gallery, well lighted, opened into a suite of little low apartments, most beautifully hung, some with silk and some with cashmere, some with tent drapery, with end-ottomans; lamps in profusion. These rooms, with busts and pictures of kings, swarmed with old nobility with historic names, stars, red ribbons, and silver bells at their button-holes: ladies in little white satin hats and toques, with a profusion of ostrich or, still better, marabout powder-puff feathers; and the roofs were too low for such lofty heads.”

This allusion of Miss Edgeworth's to the wearing of silver bells by the old nobility is thus explained. The Emigrés who returned to France at the time of the Restoration were, almost all of them, entitled to wear the Cross of St. Louis, but as a matter of fact very few of them possessed the decoration. It had either been destroyed, lost, or sold to relieve their necessities, during the evil days of the Revolution, and, therefore, for a while a tiny silver bell, costing only about half a franc, was worn at the button-hole to denote the fact that the Cross of

Delaroche

LE MARQUIS DE PASTORET

In Paris Again

St. Louis should have hung there. Gradually, however, as Paris settled down and times became better, and the ci-devant Emigrés and the Sovereign could afford it, the little bells disappeared and the Cross of St. Louis took their place.

“After a most fatiguing morning at all the impertinent and pertinent dressmakers and milliners, we finished by the dear delight of dining with Madame Gautier at Passy: drive there delicious: found her with her Sophie, now a matron mother with her Caroline, like what Madame Gautier and her Sophie were in that very room eighteen years ago. All the Delessert family that remain were assembled except Benjamin, who was detained by business in Paris. Madame Benjamin is very handsome; François the same you saw him, only with the additional crow’s-feet of eighteen years, sobered into a husband and father, the happiest I ever saw in France.

“They have three houses, and the whole three terraces form one long pleasure-ground: Judas-tree, like a Brobdingnag almond-tree, in full flower; lilacs and laburnums in abundance.”

“Tuesday we were at the Louvre: many fine pictures left. Dined at home: in the evening to Madame de Pastoret’s to meet the Duchesse de Broglie: very handsome, little, with large soft dark eyes; simple dress, winning manner . . . speaks English better than any foreigner I ever heard; not only gracious but quite tender to me."

Maria Edgeworth

This young Duchesse de Broglie was Albertine de Staël, the only daughter of Mme. de Staël. The Comtesse de Boigne thus describes her: "In spite of her hair of a somewhat pronounced colour and a few freckles, Albertine de Staël was one of the most attractive and charming persons I ever met." And another contemporary speaks of her as "excessively pretty and very clever."

Fanny Edgeworth writes on May 21: "We have just paid a visit to the Duchesse de Broglie and found her at home, alone, with her little girl running about the room. . . . We shall see her at Coppet, indeed she seems very anxious not only to see Maria but to know her."*

"After Madame de Pastoret's," continues Miss Edgeworth, "we went to the Ambassador's: † received in the most distinguished manner. Crowds of fine people, saw and conversed with Talleyrand, but he said nought worth hearing."

"May 20.—Lady Elizabeth Stuart has been most peculiarly civil to 'Madame Maria Edgeworth et Mesdemoiselles ses sœurs' which is the form on our visiting tickets, as I was advised it should be."

The French lackeys found the word "Edgeworth"

* Edgeworth MSS.

† Sir Charles Stuart was English Ambassador at this time.

In Paris Again

very difficult to pronounce ; the nearest approach to it, on their part, being "Edgevatz"; but even this was not possible to all. On one occasion, when Maria had repeated "Edgeworth" several times over to a valet, the man exclaimed in despair, "Ah! je renonce à ça!"

"The Ambassador's Hotel," writes Miss Edgeworth, "is the same which Lord Whitworth had, which afterwards belonged to the Princess Borghese; delightful! opening on to a lawn-garden, with terraces and conservatories, and a profusion of flowers and shrubs. The dinner splendid but not formal; and nobody can represent better than Lady Elizabeth. . . .

"Paris is wonderfully embellished," she remarks, "since we were here in 1803. Fanny and Harriet are quite enchanted with the beauty of the Champs Elysées and the Tuileries gardens; the trees out in full leaf, and the deep shade under them is delightful. I had never seen Paris in summer so I enjoy the novelty. Some of our happiest time is spent in driving about in the morning or returning at night by lamp or moonlight.

"Yesterday," continues Miss Edgeworth, "we had intended to have killed off a great many visits, but the fates willed it otherwise. Mr. Hummelaur, attached to the Austrian Embassy, came; and Mr. Chenevix. . . . While he was here came Madame de Villeneuve and Madame Kergolay, Lovell's friends, who spoke of him with real affection. Scarcely were they gone, when I desired Rodolphe to let no other person in, as the carriage had been ordered at eleven, and it was now near two.

Maria Edgeworth

THE ENGLISH EMBASSY

In Paris Again

“‘Miladi,’ cried Rodolphe, running in with a card, ‘voilà une dame qui me dit de vous faire voir son nom.’

“Madame de Roquefeuille with her bright benevolent eyes [appeared]: much agreeable conversation about Lovell. There is a great deal of difference between the manners, tone, pronunciation, and quietness of demeanour of Madame de Pastoret, Madame de Roquefeuille, and the little old Princesse de Broglie Revel, old nobility, and the striving, struggling of the new, with all their riches and titles, who can never attain this indescribable incommunicable charm.

“But to go on with Saturday: Madame de Roquefeuille took leave and we caparisoned ourselves and went to Lady de Ros. She at her easel copying very well a portrait of Madame de Grignan; very agreeable half-hour. . . .

“We were engaged to Cuvier’s in the evening. . . . Such streets! such turns! in the old, old parts of the city: lamps strung at great distances: a candle or two from high houses, making darkness visible: then bawling of coach or cart men, ‘Ouais! ouais!’ backing and scolding, for no two carriages could by any possibility pass in these narrow alleys. I was in a very bad way, as you may guess, but I let down the glasses, and sat as still as a frightened mouse. Once I diverted Harriet by crying out, ‘Ah! mon cher cocher,

Maria Edgeworth

arrêtez.' . . . At last we turned into a porte cochère under which the coachman bent literally double ; total darkness ; then suddenly trees, lamps and buildings ; and one brighter than the rest by an open portal illuminating large printed letters, 'Collège de France.'

ENTRANCE TO THE COLLÈGE DE FRANCE

In Paris Again

“Cuvier came down to the very carriage door to receive us, and handed us up narrow, difficult stairs into a smallish room, where were assembled many ladies and gentlemen of most distinguished names and talents. Prony, as like an honest water-dog as ever; Biot, a fat double volume of himself. . . . Then Cuvier presented Prince Czartorinski, a Pole, and many compliments passed; and then we went to a table to look at Prince Maximilian de Neufchâtel’s ‘Journey to Brazil’ magnificently printed in Germany, and all tongues began to clatter and it became wondrously agreeable; and behind me I heard English well spoken, and this was Mr. Trelawny, and I heard a panegyric on the Abbé Edgeworth, whom he knew well. . . .

“Tea and supper together: only two-thirds of the company could sit down, but the rest stood or sat behind, and were very happy, loud, and talkative: science, politics, literature, and nonsense in happy proportions. Biot sat behind Fanny’s chair and talked of the parallax and Dr. Brinkley. Prony, with his hair nearly in my plate, was telling me most entertaining anecdotes of Buonaparte; and Cuvier, with his head nearly meeting him, talking as hard as he could: not striving to show learning or wit—quite the contrary: frank open-hearted genius. . . . Harriet was on the off side, and every now and then he turned to her in the midst of his anecdotes, and made her completely one of us: and there was such a prodigious noise nobody could hear but ourselves.

Maria Edgeworth

“Both Cuvier and Prony agreed that Buonaparte never could bear to have any answer but a decided answer. ‘One day,’ said Cuvier, ‘I nearly ruined myself by considering before I answered. He asked me, “Faut-il introduire le sucre de betterave en France?” “D’abord, Sire, il faut songer si vos colonies——” “Faut-il avoir le sucre de betterave en France?” “Mais, Sire, il faut examiner——” “Bah! je le demanderai à Berthollet.”’

“This despotic, laconic mode of insisting on learning everything in two words had its inconveniences. One day he asked the master of the woods at Fontainebleau ‘How many acres of wood here?’ The master, an honest man, stopped to recollect. ‘Bah!’ and the under-master came forward and said any number that came into his head. Buonaparte immediately took the mastership from the first and gave it to the second. ‘Qu’arrivait-il?’ The rogue who gave the guess answer was soon found cutting down and selling quantities of the trees, and Buonaparte had to take the rangership from him and reinstate the honest hesitator.”

CHAPTER XXVII

THE ABBAYE-AUX-BOIS

MISS EDGEWORTH, after dining in company with a large and brilliant assemblage at the English Embassy, writes: "Lady Elizabeth asked us to go with her and Mrs. Canning to the Opera, but we were engaged to Madame Récamier; and as she is no longer rich and prosperous, I could not break the engagement."

It is true that Madame Récamier had lost her fortune. She was no longer living in luxury and ease in the magnificent Hotel of the Rue du Mont Blanc, where Miss Edgeworth had visited her in 1802. But Maria, in her generous sympathy with the distressed, was quite unaware that Madame Récamier was exerting a wider influence over society in her reduced circumstances than she had done even in the height of her prosperity.

The Comtesse de Boigne has given an interesting account in her Mémoires of the way in which Mme. Récamier bore her sudden loss of fortune. The loss occurred in the month of

Maria Edgeworth

February 1806. The Comtesse had been visiting her friend in the beautiful Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, where everything bespoke ease, happiness and security, when the news burst upon Paris of the bankruptcy of M. Récamier.

“I went at once,” writes the Comtesse, “to Madame Récamier. I found her so calm, so noble, so simple under this trial; her lofty and pure character rising above all the mere exterior circumstances of her life, that I was deeply impressed. From that moment dates my warm affection for her—an affection which subsequent vicissitudes, which we have both experienced, have only confirmed and strengthened.”

Not only had Mme. Récamier suffered this total change in her outward circumstances, but she had also suffered exile from her home and her country. This exile was inflicted by Napoleon on account of her steady attachment to Mme. de Staël, whom she had fearlessly visited in her banishment.

Now in the year 1820 she was living in some small rooms on the third story of the Abbaye-aux-Bois, an ancient convent whose wide court-yard opened into the Rue de Sèvres. At the back lay a garden enclosed within the stone buildings of the convent, with their arched cloister windows below and deep tiled roofs above.

Here in her tiny parlour beneath the tiles—her

The Abbaye-aux-Bois

cellule, as her friends called it—Mme. Récamier “reigned” over the most attractive society that Paris could produce. For here she had established by the mere force of her charming personality and of her kindly hospitality her foyer littéraire.

Chateaubriand has described his first visit to the Abbaye-aux-Bois:

“When almost breathless,” he writes, “after climbing the stairs to the third floor I entered the cellule as evening was approaching, I was enchanted with what I saw. Its windows looked down upon the garden of the Abbaye, where among the flower-beds and shrubs the nuns were pacing to and fro and children were at play. The topmost boughs of an acacia just reached the level of the eye; here and there a church-spire rose dark against the sky, and in the far distance could be seen the hills of Sèvres. The setting sun gilded the scene and shot his rays through the open windows over which birds were settling themselves for the night. I had reached a region of silence and solitude above the noise and tumult of a great city.”*

However much Chateaubriand admired the peace and solitude of the Abbaye he probably agreed with the sentiment expressed in the epigram: “O, la Solitude est une belle chose; mais il faut avoir * See “Mémoires d’outre Tombe,” par F. D. de Chateaubriand,

Maria Edgeworth

quelqu'une à qui l'on puisse dire, 'La Solitude est une belle chose!'"

We owe to the Duchesse d'Abrantes a further account of the cellule and its habitués.

"Not only was the little room on the third floor of the Abbaye-aux-Bois," she writes, "the goal of Mme. Récamier's friends, but even strangers and foreigners who had formerly begged for admittance to the elegant hotel in the [Rue du Mont Blanc], now solicited the same favour in regard to the Abbaye. One would have supposed that some fairy power must have been at work to render the steep climb up to the cellule specially easy on their account. But a recompensing sight awaited these strangers, one as singular perhaps as any that Paris could afford, that of men holding every kind of political opinion united, so to say, under one banner, marching side by side and almost hand in hand in a space of ten feet by twenty!"

We can picture to ourselves the appearance of this small room with its "bricked floor," as Chateaubriand tells us it was, "furnished with a bookcase, a harp, a piano, a portrait of Mme. de Staël, and a view of Coppet by moonlight. On the window-sills," he adds, "there were jars of flowers."

Maria Edgeworth writes on May 20 (1820): "We went to Madame Récamier's in her convent, L'Abbaye-aux-Bois, up seventy-eight steps; all came in with the asthma. . . . Madame Récamier is still beautiful, still dresses herself and her little room with elegant simplicity, and lives in a convent only because it is cheap and respectable. M. Récamier is living; they have not been separated by anything but misfortune. . . . [We met] Matthieu de Montmorenci, the Ex-Queen of Sweden, and Madame de Boigne, a charming woman.”

THE ABBAYE-AUX-BOIS

The Abbaye-aux-Bois

It is pleasant to know that Maria thus formed the acquaintance of the Comtesse de Boigne, whose Mémoires we have so frequently had occasion to quote. No wonder Miss Edgeworth found her “a charming woman,” for there is in all her writings a simplicity and candour united with grace of style that would especially appeal to Maria’s turn of mind.

The chivalric Matthieu de Montmorenci was an ardent friend and admirer of Madame Récamier. His sentiments were shared by other members of his family—notably by his cousin Adrien, Duc de Laval, and also by his cousin’s young son. Adrien wrote playfully to Mme. Récamier, “C’est le sort des Montmorenci—ils ne mouraient pas tous, mais tous étaient frappés!”

“Nearly all Mme. Récamier’s male friends,” remarks Sainte-Beuve, “had begun by being in love with her, but she possessed the truly magic power of converting their love by imperceptible degrees into friendship; and that while still leaving to them all the bloom and perfume of their original sentiment.”

Maria Edgeworth

One of her greatest attractions, we are told, lay in the fact that she had no desire to shine herself in conversation, but to bring into prominence the talents of those with whom she conversed. Her very silence is said to have been “full of intelligence.” That she could talk extremely well there is no doubt. An intimate friend, writing in later years of her, says: “I never knew anybody who could tell a story as she did—des histoires de société; she had a great sense of humour, and her own humour was exceedingly delicate, but she never said an unkind thing of any one.”

Mme. Récamier’s face with all its loveliness was evidently a difficult one to fix upon canvas. Perhaps it required a Sir Joshua Reynolds to succeed, for he would have suggested, by his subtile touch, the equal loveliness of her mind.

“Many portraits have been painted of Mme. Récamier,” observes the Comtesse de Boigne, “but, in my opinion, not one of them reproduces the expression of her true character. This is the more excusable,” she adds, “as her face is extremely mobile. Every one has praised her incomparable beauty, her active benevolence and gentle courtesy . . . but very few were able to discover, beneath the easy manners of her social intercourse, the loftiness of her mind and the independence of her character.”

The Abbaye-aux-Bois

The Duchess of Devonshire, who was an intimate friend, remarked of her: “First she’s good, next she’s spirituelle, and after that she’s beautiful.”

Another friend and contemporary, quoted by Sainte-Beuve, says of her: “She possessed what Shakespeare has termed the ‘milk of human kindness.’ Her eyes were fully open to the defects of her friends but she tended their defects as she would have tended their physical infirmities; and thus she became the Sister of Charity to their troubles, their weaknesses, and even in part to their faults.”

One of the most conspicuous of this class was Chateaubriand, whose later works would hardly have been given to the public but for her gentle care and sympathy. “All her faculties were put into play,” writes the Comtesse, “to soothe the susceptibilities of his self-love, to calm the irritability of his temperament, to ‘chercher pâture à sa vanité et distraction à son ennui.’” Her efforts, indeed, to rescue Chateaubriand from “the fiend ennui” exceeded, we are told, even those of Mme. de Maintenon on behalf of Louis XIV.

Boileau is known to have said, “I have observed that when the tone of the conversation [at Court] ceased to be that of adulation, the King always showed signs of weariness and was on the point of yawning or of quitting the room." "Every great poet who is growing old," remarks Sainte-Beuve, "is somewhat of a Louis XIV. Madame Récamier assembled from all quarters the old friends and the new admirers of Chateaubriand to entertain him; and in truth," he adds, reverting to his own personal recollections of the gentle hostess, "she bound us all with a chain of gold to the foot of his statue."

Maria Edgeworth

The Comtesse de Boigne, however, was not one of the persons thus bound.

"M. de Chateaubriand," she writes, "had no weak leanings towards the human race. He was interested only in himself, and in the task of erecting a pedestal whence he could look down upon his age; his Memoirs will reveal to the world with what energy he worked, with what perseverance, and with what hope of success. In fact he did succeed," she remarks, "in one sense; that is to say, he managed to create a sort of special atmosphere of which he was the luminary. But as soon as he quitted this atmosphere he was so painfully affected by the outer air that he became insufferably morose. As long, however, as he remained in it no one could be more amiable or radiate his sunshine more graciously.

"I remember," she continues, "being present at a reading of the Abencérages at the house of Mme. de Ségur. M. de Chateaubriand read in a voice that thrilled with tender emotion and with that belief in the value of the text which he invariably felt for all that emanated from his own brain; indeed he entered so completely into the sentiments of his characters that his tears fell down upon the paper. We shared in this emotion and I was fairly spell-bound.

The Abbaye-aux-Bois

“The reading finished, tea was brought in.

“‘Monsieur de Chateaubriand, will you take some tea?’

“‘I will thank you for a cup.’ Immediately a buzz of voices was heard on all sides:

“‘My dear, he would like some tea.’

“‘He is going to have some tea.’

“‘Give him some tea.’

“‘He asks for tea.’

“And ten ladies sprang up to wait upon the idol.”

CHAPTER XXVIII

PARISIAN SALONS IN 1820

EARLY in June, whilst Miss Edgeworth and her sisters had been spending a few days with friends in the country, there had been disturbances in the streets of Paris. On their return, they were dining one evening at the house of Mme. Suard when a guest arrived in some perturbation saying he had had to make his way through a mob, and that "the gendarmes were firing—somewhere." Presently the firing could be heard from Mme. Suard's house. "At every shot," we are told, "one of the company took the trouble to turn round and say 'Pooh!' and Madame Suard sat with her knife and fork upright, too much alarmed to eat or even to help her guests." The riots, it appears, were about "la Charte," the charter of the constitution, but they were soon suppressed.

A bon-mot of Talleyrand's à propos of "la Charte" has been recorded. "The King," he remarked, "uses his Charter as he uses his umbrella. He spreads it open in foul weather, but tucks it under his arm when the weather is fine."

Parisian Salons in 1820

The reader may remember meeting with Mme. Suard in 1802 when Mr. Edgeworth described her as "a bel esprit who aimed at singularity and independence of sentiment." The singularity had evidently increased during the lapse of eighteen years, judging by the following letter from Harriet Edgeworth.

"Maria and I went," she writes, "to tell Mme. Suard that we could take her to the French Opera, as we had doubtfully told her we would. When we went in, Mme. Suard, in a white dimity petticoat and jacket, came running out saying, 'Suis-je heureuse!' 'Oui,' said Maria. 'Ah ciel! comme vous me faites heureuse!' and throwing herself into Maria's arms, she embraced her as if she had saved her life. Having left her in a state of ecstasy, we returned home, dressed and dined at Lady de Ros's.

"[Later on] we called for Mme. Suard, who, in transports, got into the carriage and never ceased talking till we got to the theatre. Then she skipped upstairs a great deal faster than either Fanny or I did—ran along the doors reading the numbers of the boxes, and when there was some difficulty about the tickets, no power could keep her quiet. Instead of sitting down along with us, she flew from door to door, poking [her head] in through the little windows, resolved to lose nothing that could be got out of this day's pleasuring; and when we did get in [to our box], over the benches she hopped and set herself down in the front row and was at last silent—she only spoke to express her enchantment at a frightful opera of Œdipe which was going on, and which touched her so much that she was all in tears.

Maria Edgeworth

“When the opera was over a fancy seized Mme. Suard that she would go out and walk in the passage . . . but when Maria told her it could not be, and sit still she must, she submitted like a naughty girl and only stood up, moving about so incessantly that there was some danger of her falling backwards into the pit. The beginning of the ballet Clari silenced her. Mme. Bigottini acts beautifully and actually touches simply by her extreme grace, for it is a pantomime, and Mme. Suard was charmed.”*

Maria Edgeworth, writing from Paris on July 7, speaks of a breakfast-party at Degerando's at which she had been present. “We met,” she says, “Madame de Villette, Voltaire's ‘belle et bonne’; she has still some remains of beauty, and great appearance of good-humour. It was delightful to hear her speak of Voltaire with the enthusiasm of affection and with tears in her eyes beseeching us not to believe the hundred misrepresentations we may have heard, but to trust her, the person who had lived with him long, and who knew him best and last.”

* Edgeworth MSS.

Parisian Salons in 1820

We are told by a French biographer of this lady, that in the household of Ferney she held the place, practically, of an adopted daughter of Voltaire's and that he was warmly attached to her. It was not till after his death, it seems, that she became aware of his having written many works of an evil tendency of which her judgment could not approve, but dwelling rather upon the personal kindness she had received from him, than upon those writings, she retained a steady affection for his memory.

During this visit to Paris Miss Edgeworth became acquainted with some members of the Orleans family. “One evening,” we are told, “which Maria spent at Neuilly en famille impressed her with their unaffected happiness. The Duke * showed her the picture of himself teaching a school in America; Mademoiselle d'Orléans pointed to her harp, and said she superintended the lessons of her nieces; both she and her brother acknowledging how admirably Madame de Genlis had instructed them. But the old Dowager Duchess, whom Maria afterwards visited at Ivry, though she spoke of this lady in a true Christian spirit of forgiveness, admitted in a whisper to Maria and with a shake * Afterwards King Louis Philippe.

Maria Edgeworth

of her head, 'qu'elle m'avait causée bien des chagrins.'

"In the course of the evening the two eldest boys ran in from an 'Ecole d'Enseignement Mutuel,' which they attended in the neighbourhood, with their school-books in their hands and some prizes they had gained, eager to display them to their mother—a happy, simple, family party."

Almost the whole pile of buildings that formed the Palais de Neuilly, together with their park and gardens, are now unhappily destroyed. Our illustration, taken from an old print, gives some idea of their extent.

The reader may remember that Miss Edgeworth had felt some anxiety respecting the reception by the public of the "Memoirs" of her father. She writes from Paris:

"Everybody of every degree of rank or talent who has read the 'Memoirs' speaks of them in the most gratifying and delightful manner. Those who have fixed on individual circumstances have always fixed on those which we should have considered as most curious. . . . Much as I dreaded hearing [the book] spoken of, all I have yet heard has been what best compensates for all the anxiety I have felt."

After meeting Dumont a few weeks later she writes: "He speaks to me in the kindest, most tender and affectionate manner of our 'Memoirs,'

CHÂTEAU DE NEUILLY, PALACE OF THE ORLEANS FAMILY

Parisian Salons in 1820

He says he hears from England, and from all who have read them, that they have produced the effect we wished and hoped. The MS. had interested him, he said, so deeply that with all his efforts he could not put himself in the place of the indifferent public."

A theory has been started that Maria entertained a sentiment stronger than that of mere friendship for M. Dumont, judging from some of her letters to him recently brought to light. Miss Edgeworth at all times expressed herself with enthusiasm and Irish warmth of heart when writing to those with whom she was at ease, and this was eminently the case with M. Dumont, who was a valued friend and of whose literary talents she had a high opinion. Maria resembled Sir Walter Scott in her generous appreciation of the work of fellow-authors. No one could doubt for a moment either her or Scott's sincerity, yet Mary Berry, feeling Miss Edgeworth's praise to be far beyond her deserts, writes that it depressed her! To some readers, therefore, Maria's glowing expressions might seem to have a deeper meaning than was intended. We find that those members of the Edgeworth family who possess the mass of Edgeworth MSS., and who have studied Maria's character most carefully, do not give credence to the above theory.

Miss Edgeworth writes from Paris in the month of July, "Breakfasted at Camille Jordan's. It was half-past twelve before the company assembled, and we had an hour's delightful conversation with Camille Jordan and his wife in her spotless white muslin and little cap, sitting at her husband's feet as he lay on the sofa, as clean, as nice, as fresh, and as thoughtless of herself as my mother.

Maria Edgeworth

“At this breakfast we saw three of the most distinguished of that party who call themselves Les Doctrinaires—and say they are more attached to measures than to men. . . . These were Casimir Perrier, Royer Collard and Benjamin Constant, who is, I believe, of a more violent party. I do not like him at all; his countenance, voice, manner, and conversation are all disagreeable to me. He is very near-sighted, with spectacles which seem to pinch his nose. He pokes out his chin to keep the spectacles on, and yet looks over the top of his spectacles, squinching up his eyes so that you cannot see your way into his mind. . . . He does not give me any confidence in the sincerity of his patriotism, nor any high idea of his talents, though he seems to have a mighty high idea of them himself. . . .

“After this breakfast we went to the Duchesse d'Uzé—a little, shrivelled, thin, high-born, high-bred old lady, who knew and admired the Abbé Edgeworth, and received us with distinction as his relatives.”

Affairs had greatly changed in France since

Parisian Salons in 1820

1803, when Mr. Edgeworth was ordered to leave Paris, because Buonaparte supposed him to be the Abbé Edgeworth's brother. Now, as in the case of the Duchesse d'Uzé, the connection with the heroic Abbé had become a passport for Maria and her sisters to many of the houses of distinguished persons.

Parties ran high in 1820, and Maria found that in large mixed assemblies the conversation was not so agreeable for foreigners as it had been eighteen years earlier. Then, when it was dangerous under Buonaparte's system of espionnage, to talk openly of politics, there was at least this advantage that the talk naturally flowed into safer and pleasanter channels. A new word—politiquer—had now been invented. The Emigrés spoke of Liberals with the bitterest detestation as revolutionary monsters; while the Liberals spoke of Ultras as bigoted idiots. "Maria did not sympathise with the violence of either party," writes Mrs. Edgeworth, "but made her own diversion and drew her own moral from it. She perceived that neither the men, who clustered together apart from the ladies, nor the ladies, who screamed politics to attract their notice, understood what they were talking about; and she always made them agreeable to her and to themselves, by turning whomsoever she conversed with away from Ultraism and Liberalism, to wit, science or literature." Even the Buonapartists found pleasure in conversing with Miss Edgeworth, and in expressing to her their mingled feelings of regret at the loss of their hero, and of relief from his imperiousness. "The manner in which she entered into and understood this mixed feeling made the conversation, of which she was the centre, more real and less conventional than was to be heard in any other part of an assembly.

Maria Edgeworth

"But the most singular of Maria's powers of attraction," continues the writer, "was the delight which young men of fashion took in her company—those of both the styles then in vogue—the light, easy, enjoying-the-world style, and what was then becoming the mode, melancholy and Byronic. . . . One of the latter appeared to be fascinated by Maria, though she laughed at his anti-French efforts to be triste, and ridiculed his fondness for le vague in poetry."

At a small select soirée at Mme. d'Escars', where "la délicate et charmante science de la bonne compagnie" prevailed, the conversation happened to turn on dandies. "It was excessively entertaining," writes Miss Edgeworth, "to hear half a dozen Parisians all speaking at once, giving their opinion of the English dandies, who have appeared in Paris; describing their manners and sometimes by a single gesture giving an idea of the whole man. Then discussing the difference between the petit marquis of the old French comedy and the present dandy. After many attempts at definition, and calling in Madame d'Arblay's Meadows, with whom they are perfectly acquainted, they came to 'd'ailleurs c'est inconcevable ça.' And Madame d'Escars, herself the cleverest person in the room, summed it up; 'L'essentiel c'est que notre dandy, il veut plaire aux femmes s'il le peut; mais votre dandy Anglais ne le voudrait, même s'il le pourrait!'"

Parisian Salons in 1820

BOSQUET DES DÔMES, VERSAILLES

Miss Edgeworth speaks in one of her published letters of spending "a very pleasant day at dear Madame de Roquefeuille's at Versailles." In the following unpublished letter, addressed to her aunt, Miss Mary Sneyd, she gives an account of this same visit. The letter is dated July 7, 1820.

Maria Edgeworth

“When we arrived,” she writes, “Madame de Roquefeuille opened her dining-room door herself, hearing somebody coming upstairs. At first she looked in dismay at the appearance of company, but the instant she saw who we were her countenance lightened, and she ran forward and embraced me, till she almost flattened me against her warm heart.

“‘Mais, ma chère amie, vous me trouvez dans un embarras!’

“‘What is the matter?’

“‘Two bishops have just sent me word that they will come from Paris to dine with me to-day. One an old man of eighty-seven, whose whole soul and body now are in his dinner. Tous les deux gourmands, mangeant comme des ogres—l’un comme un ogre, mais vraiment, l’autre comme quatre ogres! And I have received their note by this vile petite poste but this moment, and I have nothing—nothing!’

“She sent, however, to a traiteur, that last resource, and most of our morning was spent in guessing whether these bishops would or would not come. Four o’clock came—then a rattling carriage—here they are! No! rattle passed. At last when we had just given them up, rattle, rattle—dash, and stop. Here they are! And a more curious, entertaining, tiresome, comic, melancholy scene than the whole dinner, and whole appearance and conversation of these two old bishops, I never saw or heard.

FANNY EDGEWORTH

Parisian Salons in 1820

“The first, the 87, Bishop of Agen, grand aumônier du Roi, was a little hunchbacked, decrepit man, with a face of a monkey, with eyes that had been acute, but were now almost meaningless; a head close-shaved in a little white wig, made to imitate grey hair as well as it could (viz., very ill). And this wig was quite crooked on the unconscious prelate’s head. No collar to his black coat left his little shrunk neck more conspicuous. Still, and through all, he looked like a gentleman. The other, of larger stature and more erect mien, might be about 60—a jovial kind of bishop—the Bishop of Carcassonne.

“Dinner—dinner—dinner! was the grand sole object of both for the first two hours—the first hour in expectation, the second in enjoyment. Yes, in real enjoyment, for, in spite of all obstacles, Mme. de Roquefeuille had a good dinner for them. Not such a dinner as would have contented two English bishops; because their souls would have been set on far different and more substantial fare, more grandly served. But the substance of good eating, no matter for the form, was here, and much it was enjoyed, with napkin under chin, and chicken-legs gnawing!

Maria Edgeworth

“(I beg your pardon, my dear Aunt Mary, but upon my word it’s true.)

“The ease and good-breeding of Mme. de Roquefeuille were charming. No one who saw her could have doubted that she had been used to live in the very best company, though not of this day, or this day’s fashion. The talk was now and then of the great, and the princes of other times, and often of the Court of this day; with bitterness and indiscretion on the part of Carcassonne. Poor Agen was dead and gone almost to all things but his dinner, and of this he could not eat as much as could be wished. In the middle of dinner he turned to Fanny and said pathetically, ‘On dit que je suis gourmand, mais vraiment je ne le suis pas. Je ne mange que mon diner—point de déjeuner, que mon diner!’ And, indeed, as Fanny, who pitied him much, avers, he ate but little after all.

“These two bishops came twelve miles to this dinner and returned that night.”

CHAPTER XXIX

COPPET

EARLY in the month of August (1820) Maria Edgeworth and her sisters left Paris for Geneva, where they had been invited to pay a visit to their Irish friends Mr. and Mrs. Moilliet, who had a house at Pregny, near Geneva.

Thence Maria writes: "I did not conceive it possible that I should feel so much pleasure from the beauties of nature as I have done since I came to this country. The first moment when I saw Mont Blanc will remain an era in my life—a new idea, a new feeling, standing alone in the mind." And she dwells with pleasure on the appearance of the mountain slopes, "cultivated with garden care, green vineyards, patches of blé de Turquie, hemp and potatoes, all without enclosure of any kind, mixed with trees and shrubs: then the garden-cultivation abruptly ceasing—bare white rocks and fir above, fir measuring straight to the eye the prodigious height."

"We are most comfortably settled here," she says. "Dumont, Pictet, Dr. and Mrs. Marcet, and various others dined and spent two most agreeable evenings here. . . . M. Pictet is as kind, as active, and as warm-hearted as ever. . . . Dumont is very kind and cordial. He seems to enjoy universal consideration here and he loves Mont Blanc, next to Bentham, above all created things."

Maria Edgeworth

During her sojourn in the neighbourhood of Geneva, Maria had the great pleasure of visiting the château of Coppet, which, since Mme. de Staël's death in 1817, had passed into the hands of her son Auguste de Staël and of her daughter Albertine, now Mme. de Broglie. The château stands, as the reader may remember, on the north-western shore of the Lake of Geneva, and can be seen from the water rising above the village of Coppet, whose cottages seem to nestle beneath its sheltering walls. Lofty mountains form its background.

"What Ferney was to Voltaire," remarks Sainte-Beuve, "Coppet was to Mme. de Staël; but with a much more poetic halo around it and of a nobler existence. Both authors reigned in their exile—but Coppet has counteracted and almost dethroned Ferney."

In a letter dated "Château de Coppet, Sep. 28, 8 A.M.," Miss Edgeworth writes:

"We came here yesterday, and here we are in the very apartments occupied by M. Necker, opening into what is now the library, but what was once that theatre on which Madame de Staël used to act her own 'Corinne.' Yesterday evening when Madame de Broglie had placed me next the oldest friend of the family, M. de Bonstettin, he whispered to me, 'You are now in the exact spot, in the very chair where Madame de Staël used to sit!' Her friends were excessively attached to her. This old man talked of her with tears in his eyes, and with all the sudden change of countenance and twitchings of the muscles which mark strong uncontrollable feeling.

CHÂTEAU DE COPPET

Coppet

"There is something inexpressibly melancholy, awful, in this house, in these rooms, where the thought continually occurs, here Genius was! here was Ambition, Love! all the great struggles of the passions; here was Madame de Staël! The respect paid to her memory by her son and daughter and by M. de Broglie is touching."

Maria writes on another occasion: "M. de Staël is correcting for the press 'Les dix Années d'Exil.' He told me that his mother never gave any work to the public in the form in which she had originally composed it. She changed the arrangement and expression of her thoughts with such facility, and was so little attached to her own first views of the subject, that often a work was completely remodelled by her while passing through the press.

"Her father disliked to see her make any formal preparation for writing when she was young, so that she used to write often on the corner of the chimney-piece, or on a pasteboard held in her hand, and always in a room with others; for her father could not bear her to be out of the room—and this habit of writing without preparation she preserved ever afterwards.”

Maria Edgeworth

The Comtesse de Boigne bears testimony to this statement: “Madame de Staël,” she says, “had no private study for work. A little writing-case of green morocco, which she placed upon her knees, and carried from room to room, contained both her works and her correspondence and often even this case was surrounded by people. . . . Talking seemed to be the most important business of life at Coppet, and yet almost all the persons composing its society were seriously occupied, as is proved by the large number of works from their pen.”

A story is told by one of Mme. de Staël’s biographers—M. Albert Sorel—that one day when she and Constant were driving among the mountains with some friends, the subject of Mdlle. de Lespinasse’s “Letters,” recently published, came under discussion.

“Madame de Staël and Benjamin began to talk, and they talked so well that nobody noticed either a frightful thunderstorm which burst overhead, or the inundated roads, or the long shelter taken by their carriage under the archway of an inn. The storm passed—Benjamin and Mme. de Staël were talking still, when, arriving at home, the travellers learnt from the servants the adventure that had befallen them.”

Coppet

The Comtesse de Boigne, it appears, was one of this party. She writes: “A terrible storm raged, the night was pitch dark, the postillions lost their way, and we were five hours on the road instead of an hour and a half. On reaching our destination we were confounded by discovering the lateness of the hour and the anxiety we had caused our friends. . . . The enchantress, assisted by Benjamin Constant, had kept us so completely under her spell that we had no thought to bestow on outward circumstances.”

Contemporary writers, one after another, bear testimony to the extraordinary power which Mme. de Staël exercised over her hearers. “She was one of those privileged beings,” says M. Villemain, “whose lofty and commanding nature can never sink into oblivion; one who seized at once upon the imagination and the heart and whose very countenance was so vividly stamped upon your vision that were you a painter you might represent it upon canvas after the lapse of thirty years, without losing a single trait.”

“The study of her character,” remarks Mme. Necker de Saussure, “was l'étude de notre nature faite en grand.” Her deep-toned voice and her manners generally were considered by some people to be too masculine, but "her woman's nature showed itself in all she did by her need of affection."

Maria Edgeworth

"She never hesitated in speaking," says a friend. "The word which best conveyed her meaning always came uppermost, without effort." "Her conversation," says another, "was never tainted by pedantry or obvious preparation. . . . Its dominant feature was perfect naturalness, and she could talk of dress with as much interest as of the constitution of a State."

It was the opinion of those who knew her well, that Mme. de Staël was yet more remarkable in her talk than in her writings. We can understand this; for eloquent as her pages are, the lack of humour in them cannot but be felt by English readers and we are told that humour was not absent from her conversation.

In the mode of life at Coppet there was much that was strange and grotesque, as well as interesting and noble, just as there was, indeed, in the character of its châtelaine. The Comtesse de Boigne, who had a real affection for Mme. de Staël and for her children, has described it for posterity.

"The life," she says, "seemed idle and irregular in the extreme. There was neither method nor order. No rooms were set apart for any special purpose; but wherever a conversation happened to

Gérard, peint.

Braun, Clément & Co., photo.

ALBERTINE DE STAËL, DUCHESSE DE BROGLIE

Coppet

commence there all the company soon assembled, and there they would remain for hours together, without being interfered with by any of the ordinary avocations of a household. . . . The children of Madame de Staël were brought up and educated in the midst of this strange existence, in which they appeared to take a part. But they must have had in fact many hours for quiet study, for it is impossible that in the midst of such disorder they could have acquired all the learning and all the accomplishments they possessed, which included several languages, music and dancing, as well as a thorough knowledge of the literature of all Europe.

“They were allowed to follow their own tastes completely. Albertine’s were of a grave nature. She was occupied chiefly with metaphysics and religion and the study of German and English literature, [while] Auguste, who possessed less talent for grave subjects than his sister, had in addition to his literary acquirements a truly remarkable gift for music.”

“M. de Staël,” writes Miss Edgeworth, “speaks English perfectly, and with the air of an Englishman of fashion. . . . He told me of a curious interview he had with Buonaparte, when the [latter] was enraged with Madame de Staël, who had published remarks on his government, concluding with, ‘Oh well, you are right. I allow that a son should always defend his mother, but if Monsieur wishes to write libels he should go to England. Or indeed if he desires fame it is in England that he should seek it—in England or in France—these two countries are the only countries in Europe—nay in the world!’ . . .

Maria Edgeworth

VILLAGE AND CHÂTEAU FROM THE LAKE

“M. de Staël called his little brother, Alphonse Rocca, to introduce him to us; he is a pleasing, gentle-looking, ivory-pale boy with dark blue eyes, not the least like Madame de Staël. . . . After our walk [in the grounds] M. de Staël proposed our going on the lake—and we rowed for about an hour. The deep, deep blue of the water, and the varying colours as the sun shone and the shadows of the clouds appeared on it, were beautiful. When we returned and went to rest in M. de Staël's cabinet, Dumont, who had quoted from Voltaire's 'Ode on the Lake of Geneva,' read it to us."

Coppet

Miss Edgeworth met many interesting people in the town of Geneva, where Mme. de Staël's inspiring influence was still maintained by her descendants.

"In no place, perhaps, with the exception of Edinburgh," remarks Sainte-Beuve, "was there to be found united within such narrow limits . . . an equal variety of talents, of opinions, and of culture in all its branches—an assemblage [in short] of beings so noble, so enlightened, so animated yet so courteous; in fact, so altogether excellent."

Among the "distinguished women" of Geneva he mentions especially Mme. Necker de Saussure, in whose salon there reigned une grâce piquante et sérieuse."

It was of this lady that Mme. de Staël said, "She has all the talents that I am supposed to possess and all the virtues that I lack."

Maria speaks with pleasure of meeting her at the house of M. Pictet de Rochemont. "Her manner and figure," she writes, "reminded us of our beloved Mrs. Moutray; she is deaf too, and she has the same resignation, free from suspicion in her expression when she is speaking, and the same gracious attention to the person who speaks to her. . . ."

Maria Edgeworth

“M. Pictet de Rochemont,” she says, “brother to our old friend, has taken most kind pains to translate the best passages from my father’s Memoirs for the Bibliothèque Universelle!”

Miss Edgeworth speaks of meeting another member of the Pictet family—M. Pictet Déodat—of whom she tells us Mme. de Staël said: “If one could take hold of his neckcloth and give him one good shaking, what a number of good things would come out!”

While Miss Edgeworth was in Switzerland, her “Sequel to Rosamond” was passing through the press, and her publisher found that, by some mistake, she had not furnished sufficient MS. to complete the two volumes required. “I was a little provoked with Hunter,” she writes to her sister Honora, “for not having counted it himself, and for not letting me sooner know the result. But this feeling lasted but a moment, and my mind fixes on what is to be done? It is by no means necessary for me to be at home or in any particular place to invent or to write. You were satisfied with the little ‘Palanquin’ addition I sent you, and I hope I shall be able to please you with what I shall write now.”

“Maria instantly set to work,” writes Mrs. Edgeworth, “to supply the deficiency; and in the midst of all the attractions of a society she particularly enjoyed, where breakfasts, drives, and evening parties seemed to occupy every hour of every day, she wrote with all her usual ease and spirit the beautiful chapters of 'The Bracelet of Memory,' and 'Blind Kate.'"

Coppet

Speaking of the many friends with whom Maria had enjoyed intercourse in the neighbourhood of Geneva, the writer remarks: "With M. de Staël and Madame de Broglie, Maria was particularly happy.

"'Comme la Duchesse est charmante!' as Dumont—little given as he was to praise—one night exclaimed, as he was driving home from Coppet with Maria and my daughters.

"Dumont's society, always agreeable, was more than ever delightful at Geneva. He was proud of his country, enthusiastic in his taste for the fine scenery. Cheerful, wise and witty, and full of literary anecdote, his conversation was peculiarly suited to Maria; while he especially gratified her by talking to her sisters and being to them like a kind old uncle."

On quitting Switzerland Maria writes: "Dumont was excessively touched at parting with us, and gave Fanny and Harriet La Fontaine and Gresset, and to me a map of the lake—of the tour we took so happily together."

CHAPTER XXX

FAREWELL TO FRANCE

THE Edgeworths reached Paris, after spending a few days at Lyons, on October 27. Maria writes on the following day from the Hôtel Vauban, 366 Rue Saint-Honoré :

“We arrived here yesterday. Good Mrs. Creed, whom we troubled to look out for lodgings for us, has engaged a floor in this hotel, which we have all to ourselves—very comfortable; the woman of the house respectable and civil, and we have Rodolphe again for our valet de place, and a femme de chambre, whom I like better than our former Josephine.”

In a letter written early in November to her aunt Mrs. Ruxton, she says: “I write this merely to tell you that I have at last had the pleasure of seeing Madame la Comtesse de Vaudreuil, the daughter of your friend. She is an exceedingly pleasing woman, of high fashion, with the remains of great beauty, courteous and kind to us beyond all expectation. She had but a few days in Paris and she made out two for us ; she took us to the Conciergerie to see, by lamp-light, the dungeon where the poor Queen and Madame Elizabeth were confined, now fitted up as little chapels. . . . Who do you think accompanied us to this place? Lady Beauchamp, Lady Longford's mother, a great friend of Madame de Vaudreuil's, with whom we dined the next day, and who had procured for us the Duc de Choiseul's box at the Théâtre Français, when the house was to be uncommonly crowded to see Mademoiselle Duchenois in Athalie 'avec tous les Chœurs,' and a most striking spectacle it was! I had never seen Mademoiselle Duchenois to perfection before. . . .

Farewell to France

"We have seen Mademoiselle Mars twice, or thrice rather, in the Mariage de Figaro and in the little pieces of Le jaloux sans Amour and La jeunesse de Henri Cinq, and admire her exceedingly."

Mary Berry, who was in Paris a few years earlier, writes: "I long to see Mdlle. Mars again, for perfect she is, and perfect I have no doubt I shall find her. . . . But what a perfect thing is French comedy! The representations of their life and their manners are so perfectly natural that all idea of a theatre vanishes ; and as they admit of much more conversation, and less action and bustle, on the stage than we do, one often feels oneself admitted into the interior of a private house, and listening to their family arrangements."

Maria Edgeworth

“En petit comité, the other night,” writes Miss Edgeworth, “at the Duchesse d’Escars’, a discussion took place between the Duchesse de la Force, Marmont, and Pozzo di Borgo, on the bon et mauvais ton of different expressions—bonne société is an expression bourgeoise—you may say bonne compagnie or la haute société, ‘Voilà des nuances,’ as Madame d’Escars said. Such a wonderful jabbering as these grandees made about these small matters!

“. . . We have seen a great deal of our dear Delesserts, and of Madame de Rumford, who gave us a splendid dinner. And one evening with the Princess Potemkin, who is most charming, and you may bless you stars that you are not obliged to read a page of panegyric upon her.”

When in Paris during the month of July, Miss Edgeworth had met the Russian Prince, Rostopchin, “the man who burnt Moscow, first setting fire to his own house.” “I never saw a more striking Calmuck countenance,” she writes. “From his conversation as well as from his actions, I should think him a man of great strength of character.”

At Madame Potemkin’s the company were telling anecdotes of Rostopchin. “The Governor of Siberia, it seems, lived at St. Petersburg, and never went near his province. One day the Emperor, in presence of the governor and of

Farewell to France

Rostopchin, was boasting of his far-sightedness. 'Commend me,' said Rostopchin, 'to M. le Gouverneur, who sees so well from Petersburg to Siberia.'" Maria writes to her stepmother on November 15: "After leaving Madame Potemkin's we went to see—whom do you think? Guess all round the breakfast-table before you turn over the leaf; if anybody guesses right, I guess it will be Aunt Mary.

"Madame de la Rochejacquelin! She had just arrived from the country, and we found ourselves in a large hotel, in which all the winds of heaven were blowing, and in which, as we went upstairs and crossed the antechambers, all was darkness, except one candle which the servant carried before us. In a small bedroom, well furnished, with a fire just lighted, we found Madame de la Rochejacquelin lying on a sofa—her two daughters at work—one spinning with a distaff, and the other embroidering muslin."

Madame de la Rochejacquelein (for so the name is usually spelt), we would remind the reader, was the heroine of the wars in La Vendée, waged against the Royalists during the first and maddest years of the French Republic. Her Mémoires, published in the autumn of 1815, on the final fall of Napoleon, created a widespread sensation. They describe with simplicity and candour the tragic events of the time. Her first husband, M. de Lescure, who was the fast friend and companion of the heroic Henri de la Rochejacquelein, perished, like him, in the wars. Her second husband, the Marquis de la Rochejacquelein, who was a younger brother of Henri's, was unhappily killed when endeavouring to oppose the advance of Buonaparte and his followers after his escape from Elba.

Maria Edgeworth

To return to Miss Edgeworth's account of her visit.

“Madame is a large fat woman,” she writes, “with a broad, round, fair face, with a most open benevolent expression. Her hair cut short, and perfectly grey as seen under her cap; the rest of her face much too young for such grey locks; not at all the hard, weather-beaten look that had been described to us, and though her face and bundled form and dress all squashed on a sofa did not at first promise much of gentility, you could not hear her speak or see her for three minutes without perceiving that she was well-born and well-bred. She had hurt her leg, which was the cause of her lying on the sofa. It seemed a grievous penance, as she is of as active a temper as ever. She says her health is perfect, but a nervous disease in her eyes has nearly deprived her of sight—she could hardly see my face, though I sat as close as I could go to the sofa.

“‘ I am always sorry,’ said she, ‘ when any stranger

Farewell to France

sees me, parceque je sais que je détruis toute illusion. Je sais que je devrais avoir l'air d'une héroïne, et surtout que je devrais avoir l'air malheureux ou épuisé au moins—rien de tout cela, hélas !'

"She is much better than a heroine—she is benevolence and truth itself. She begged her daughters to take us into the salon to show us what she thought would interest us. . . . At one end of the salon is a picture of M. de Lescure, and at the other of Henri de la Rochejacquelin, by Gérard and Girardet, presents from the King. Fine military figures. In the boudoir is one of M. de la Rochejacquelin, much the finest of all—she has never yet looked at this picture.

"Far from being disappointed I was much gratified by this visit."

Soon after this letter was written Miss Edgeworth and her sisters quitted Paris and commenced their long homeward journey. They halted at Calais, whence Maria writes, on December 5, from the Hôtel Dessin :

"Coming back to this place to the same room where we were seven months ago, the whole seems to me and to my companions like a delightful dream, but on waking from Alps, and glaciers, and cascades, and Mont Blanc, and troops of acquaintance in splendid succession and visionary confusion—in waking from this wonderful dream the sober certainty of happiness remains and assures us that all which has passed is not a dream. All our old friends at Paris, still more our friends than ever, and many new ones made. Every expectation, every hope that I had formed for this journey has been more than gratified, far surpassed by the reality; and we return with thorough satisfaction to our own country, looking to our dear home for permanent happiness, without a wish unsatisfied or a regret for anything we have left behind, except our friends."

Maria Edgeworth

INDEX

A

- Abington, Mrs., Sir Joshua Reynolds' "Comic Muse," retired from the stage, Maria Edgeworth hears her recite two epilogues "with exquisite wit and grace," p. 122
- Aikin, Lucy, her description of Joanna Baillie, p. 202; edits Mrs. Barbauld's works, p. 214
- Ainger, Canon, his words upon Joanna Baillie's "lyric vein," p. 198; his childish recollections of acting in Mrs. Barbauld's "engaging dramas," p. 210
- Aldis, Janet, her work upon Mme. Geoffrin, p. 13-15
- Allied Armies, approaching French frontier, January 1814, p. 132; enter Paris, March 31, p. 140; enter Paris after Battle of Waterloo, July 6, 1815, p. 170; grand Review of, in Paris, July 24, p. 172
- Angely, Regnault St. Jean d', applied to by Lovell Edgeworth for leave to remain in Paris, his letter to the Duc de Feltre, p. 135-9; his flight from Paris, p. 141
- Anglas, Boissy d', anecdote of, p. 33
- Angoulême, Duchesse d', her entry with Louis XVIII. into Paris, May 3, 1814, interest of populace in her as "The Orphan of the Temple Prison," p. 149
- Arblay, General d' (Comte), general officer in Garde du Corps of Louis XVIII., attends him in his flight to Ghent, March 1815, p. 160
- Arblay, Mme. d' (Fanny Burney), experience of a Parisian modiste of 1802, p. 40; sees Bonaparte at Grand Review, p. 50-1; her words about Mme. de Genlis, p. 63-4; her visits to Hampstead, p. 90; her account of effect produced in Paris by Bonaparte's escape from Elba, p. 155-6; quits Paris on flight of Louis XVIII. (March 19, 1815), her hurried journey, reaches Brussels, sees Duke of Wellington, anecdote of, p. 160-2; her

Index

- account of experiences during June 16, 17 and 18, taken partly from unpublished letter, arrival of news of victory of Waterloo, p. 162-5
- Austen, Jane, publication of "Sense and Sensibility" in 1811, p. 94-5
- Austria, Emperor of, lays claim to art treasures carried away from his Italian States by Napoleon, p. 178-9
- B
- Baillie, Agnes (elder sister of Joanna Baillie), p. 194 ; p. 202-3 ; p. 204-5
- Baillie, Joanna, her letter to Walter Scott upon Maria Edgeworth in London society in 1813, p. 108-9 ; receives visit from Maria Edgeworth at Bolton House, her first meeting with Walter Scott, his admiration for her "Plays on the Passions," her "Outlaws' Chorus," p. 197-202 ; public Reading in Hampstead of one of the "Plays," p. 203-5 ; at Mrs. Carr's fête, p. 206-7
- Banks, Sir Joseph, receives Emperor of Russia at his house in London in June, 1814, p. 153
- Barbault, Mrs., writes on approaching peace with France, p. 1 ; on three most prominent persons in London society (May 1813) p. 100 ;
- "France a conquered country," p. 150 ; writes of Royal visitors in London in June 1814, p. 152-3 ; her correspondence with Maria Edgeworth, her contributions to "Evenings at Home," her poem entitled "1811," her personal appearance, Wordsworth's admiration of her stanza on "Life," her verses entitled "Lines placed over a Chimney-piece," p. 209-15
- Beauchamp, Lady, p. 277
- Beaufort, Captain (afterwards Admiral), p. 218
- Berry, Agnes, lines addressed to her and her sister by Horace Walpole, Maria Edgeworth's intercourse with, Lord Houghton's words upon her and her sister's salon, p. 103-5 ; letter to them from Maria Edgeworth, Horace Walpole's "Reminiscences of the Courts of George I. and II.," written for her and her sister's amusement, p. 182-4
- Berry, Mary describes Mme. Récamier's house in Paris (1802), p. 18-19 ; writes of fashions of 1802, sees Vestris dance, p. 40-1 ; magnificence of First Consul's apartments at the Tuileries, p. 49-50 ; meets Maria Edgeworth, Horace Walpole's description of her and her sister, his verses addressed to them, Lord Houghton's account of

Index

- their salon, p. 103-5; her shrewd words about Mme. de Staël, p. 131; letter to her giving details of Bonaparte's escape from Elba, p. 154-5; arrival of news in London of victory of Waterloo (June 21, 1815), p. 169; arrival of news of Napoleon's surrender of his person on board the Bellerophon, p. 171; letter to, about Paris in August (1815), p. 177-8; p. 255; on French comedy, p. 277
- Berthaut, celebrated architect, p. 18
- Bessborough, Lady, p. 59
- Bigottini, Mme., French actress, p. 252
- Biot, M., at Cuvier's gathering, May 1820, p. 237-8
- Blucher, General, visits England, June 1814, his popularity, p. 150-2; in Paris in July 1815, desires to blow up the bridge of Jena, p. 171-2; at Duke of Wellington's Ball, p. 176
- Boigne, Comtesse de, describes entry of Allies into Paris, March 31, 1814, visits bivouac of Cossacks in Champs Elysées, Bourbon demonstration in Opera House, sees entry of Louis XVIII. into Paris, p. 145-8; disapproves of "spoliations" demanded by the Allies, p. 179; her account of sensation produced in Paris by "MS. de Sainte-Hélène, p. 191-2; her friendship with Mme. Récamier, p. 240; meets Maria Edgeworth in the Abbaye-aux-Bois, p. 245; her words on the portraits of Mme. Récamier, p. 246; Mme. Récamier and Chateaubriand, is present at Reading given by Chateaubriand from one of his works, p. 247-9; gives anecdotes of Mme. de Staël, her mode of life at Coppet, and the education of her children, p. 268-71
- Bonaparte, Napoleon, see under Napoleon
- Bonaparte, Mme., p. 26
- Bonstettin, Charles-Victor de, at Coppet, p. 267
- Bourdon, M., his account of Rousseau's connection with the Delesserts, p. 9-10
- Boys, Edward (afterwards Captain Boys, R.N.), a prisoner-of-war at Verdun in 1804, his account of prisoners' life, and brutal treatment by prison authorities, his escape in 1807, p. 83-6; his account of prisoners leaving Verdun in January 1814, p. 132-3
- Broglie, Duchesse de (Albertine de Staël), "most attractive and charming," p. 231-2; receives visit from Maria Edgeworth at Coppet, p. 264-7; her strange education, p. 271; Dumont's praise of her, p. 275

Index

- Buonaparte, Napoleon, see
under Napoleon
- Buonaparte, Mme. Louis, pupil of Mme. Compan, p. 33; her appearance and character,
p. 59-60
- Burney, Dr., met by Mr. Edgeworth at Mrs. Crewe's house at Hampstead, p. 89
- Buxton Mr. (afterwards Sir Thos. Fowell), meets Maria
Edgeworth in winter of 1819,
p. 218
- Byron, Lord, meets Maria
Edgeworth in 1813, his admiration of her and his criticisms on Mr. Edgeworth, p. 107; his style of poetry imitated in "Rejected Addresses," p. 121; his works discussed in London in 1813,
p. 125; forms a contrast to
Mme. de Staël in society, their conversation at a dinner party described, his remarks about Mme. de Staël,
p. 128-30
- C
- Camelford Cottage, Mrs.
Crewe's "villa at Hampstead," p. 89-90
- Campan, Mme, mistress of celebrated school for girls in France, p. 33; plays acted by her pupils, p. 59-60
- Carlyle, Thos., describes Paris in 1824, p. 7
- Carr, Mr., Mrs., and family, receive visit from Maria
Edgeworth at their house,
Maryon Hall, Hampstead,
fête there described by her,
p. 206-9; p. 222
- Chardin, eminent French painter, his portrait of Mme.
Geoffrin, p. 13
- Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, summer residence of the Récamiers, a fête there described, p. 19-26
- Chateaubriand, F. D. de, his first visit to the cellule of Mme. Récamier, p. 241-2;
his friendship for her, gives a Reading from one of his works, p. 247-9
- Collard, Royer, at breakfast party at Camille Jordan's,
p. 256
- Condorcet, p. 30
- Constant, Benjamin, overtures made to him by Napoleon in March 1815, his interview with him, is made a State Councillor, p. 158-9; anecdote of his and Mme. de Staël's eloquent talk, p. 268-9
- Consul, First, see under
Napoleon
- Coppet, Château de, after death of Mme. de Staël in 1817 passes into possession of Auguste de Staël and Mme. de Broglie, compared by Sainte-Beuve with Ferney, its associations with
Mme. de Staël, p. 264-7
- Courcelles, Commandant of Verdun, brutal treatment of prisoners-of-war by, p. 85-6

Index

- Courlande, Hôtel de, where Edgeworth family stayed in autumn 1802, p. 5-6; p. 11
Crewe, Mrs. (afterwards Lady), a déjeuner at her villa at Hampstead, description of house, p. 89-90; meets Maria Edgeworth, p. 106
Cuvier, Baron, interesting gathering in his rooms in the Collège de France, his anecdotes of Bonaparte, p. 235-8

D

- Dalgourski, Princess, at La Harpe's house, p. 26
Darwin, Dr. (Erasmus), "a first-rate genius," p. 187
Davy, Sir Humphry, p. 100
Davy, Lady, Maria Edgeworth at her parties, p. 100-3; p. 107-8
Day, Thos. (author of "Sandford and Merton"), friend of Mr. Edgeworth in early life, humorous letter from, p. 12-13
Degérando, p. 43
Delessert, Mme., described by Maria Edgeworth, Rousseau's "Lettres sur la Botanique" written to her and her daughter, his "Herbal Flowers" given to them, p. 9-10; benefactress of Rousseau, p. 29-30; gathering at her house, p. 37-8; p. 231
Delessert, Benjamin, meets the Edgeworths, October 1802, p. 8-9; p. 37; visits Mr. Edgeworth in his banishment, p. 53; meets Maria Edgeworth in May 1820, p. 231
Delessert, Mme. Benjamin, p. 231
Delessert, François, meets Maria Edgeworth in October 1802, p. 38; meets her again in May 1820, p. 231
Desmoulins, Camille, p. 43
Duchenois, Mdlle., celebrated actress, her performance in Phèdre described by Rogers, p. 8; seen by Maria Edgeworth in Athalie (October 1820), p. 277
Dumas, Alexandre, sees Napoleon on his flight from Battle of Waterloo, p. 166-8
Dumont, Pierre Etienne Louis, translator of Bentham's works into French, p. 10; his friendship for Maria Edgeworth, p. 254-5; intercourse with her in Switzerland, p. 264; p. 273; "cheerful, wise, witty," p. 275
Duras, Mme. de, p. 179

E

- Edelcrantz, Chevalier, his proposal of marriage to Maria Edgeworth, her refusal, p. 34-6
Edgeworth, Abbé, p. 6; p. 26; attended Louis XVI. on the scaffold, p. 24; Bonaparte's suspicion of Mr. Edgeworth as being his brother, p. 54;

Index

- his name honoured in 1820, p. 266-7
- Edgeworth, Charlotte, described by M. Pictet, p. viii-ix; goes with family to France, p. 2; journey through Flanders, arrival in Paris, describes "Statue of Liberty," p. 3-6; at Mme. Récamier's house, p. 17; p. 28; describes Parisian party, p. 37-8; much admired in Paris, p. 39; at Grand Review, p. 52
- Edgeworth, Fanny, at Mrs. Carr's fête, p. 207; her visit to Trentham, p. 216-17; arrival in Paris, April 29, 1820, much admired in society, p. 225-9; a visit to the Duchesse de Broglie's, p. 232-3; at gathering at Cuvier's, p. 235-8; at Mme. de Roquefeuille's house at Versailles, p. 262; leaves Paris for Geneva, p. 263; return to Paris October 27, leaves Paris and arrives at Calais, p. 281
- Edgeworth, Harriet, at Mrs. Carr's fête, p. 207; arrival in Paris, April 29, 1820, much admired in society, p. 225-9; p. 283; at gathering at Cuvier's, p. 235-8; describes a visit to the Opera with Mme. Suard, p. 251-2; leaves Paris for Geneva, p. 263; returns to Paris, October 27, p. 276; leaves Paris and arrives at Calais, p. 281
- Edgeworth, Honora, her visit to Trentham, p. 216-7
- Edgeworth, Lovell, described by M. Pictet, p. viii-ix; in Geneva 1803, sent as prisoner of war to Verdun (August 14), his letter on arrival, p. 77-80; offers to renounce his rights as heir to Edgeworthstown, p. 87; remains a prisoner at Verdun for nearly eleven years, sent with other prisoners to Paris (January 1814), is there during fall of Empire and entry of Allies, his narrative taken from original MSS. p. 132-41; p. 142-4; is introduced to the Miss Berrys, p. 182-3
- Edgeworth, Maria, suggestions for Prefaces, p. v.-vi.; her life at Edgeworthstown, personal appearance and conversation, p. vi.-viii.; leaves Edgesworthstown for Paris, halt in London, journey through Flanders, arrival in Paris (October 29, 1802), p. 2-4; stays in Hôtel de Courlande, afterwards in the Rue de Lille, p. 5-6; meets the Delesserts, de Pastorets and Abbé Morellet, interesting society at Mme. Gautier's house, p. 8-11; her story of "Forester," p. 12; describes French society of 1802, intercourse with Mme. Récamier, p. 16-18; visit with Mme. Récamier to La Harpe, p. 25-6; opinion of the acting of Talma and of Mme. Talma, her story of "Mme. de Fleury," writes about Parisian friends, p. 29-34; proposal of marriage made by M. Edelcrantz, reasons for her refusal, p. 34-6, a Bal d'Enfants, p. 38-9; "Belinda" translated into French, French savants an essential part of good company, her brilliant conversation in French described by Mrs. Edgeworth, her intimate knowledge of French national characteristics shown in her novels, p. 42-8; sees Bonaparte at grand Review, his words upon England, accompanies her father to Passy, p. 50-3; meets Mme. d'Houditot at the Abbé Morellet's, her appearance and character described, anecdote of Rousseau, p. 56-9; sees plays acted by Mme. Campan's pupils, visit to Mme. de Genlis, p. 60-3; war being imminent quits Paris, arrival in London, p. 68-70; writes of her brother Lovell, p. 87; of a masquerade at Edgeworthstown, of her father meeting Dr. Burney, a bon-mot of Mrs. Montagu's, p. 88-90; first series of "Tales of Fashionable Life," published (June 1809), well reviewed, Dumont's remarks and Mme. de Staël's opinions, second series of "Tales" published, including "Absentee" in 1812, her interest in "Waverley," Walter Scott's Tribute to herself, p. 90-6; scene from "Love and Law," p. 97-9; visit to London (May 1813), accounts of interesting society, Lord Byron's words about her, p. 104-7; ovations paid to her described by Joanna Baillie, Walter Scott's letters about her, p. 108-10; at meeting on Lancastrian schools, receiving and paying visits, her love of children, Duchess of Wellington, great gathering at Mrs. Hope's, declines to visit the Princess of Wales, p. 111-18; at Drury Lane Theatre, anecdote of Mrs. Siddons, hears her recite the part of Queen Katherine, p. 120-4; her admiration of "Corinne," p. 125-6; MS. of Lovell's adventures docketed by her, p. 133; writes of Bourbons restored to power, p. 148-50; a Lord Mayor's feast, p. 170; her playful letter, p. 179-80; unpublished letter to the Miss Berrys, p. 182-3; composes "Ormond," her father's death (June 1817), her devotion to her father, her love of needlework, admiration of Dr. Darwin, amusing note to a relative, p. 184-8; writes upon the "MS. de Sainte-Hélène," p. 189-90; visits Joanna Baillie and her sister at Hampstead autumn of

Index

Index

1818, their interesting conversation, receives letter from Walter Scott, p. 193-7; her visit to the Carrs at Hampstead, their family fête, p. 206-9; her correspondence with Mrs. Barbauld, p. 209-13; visits Lady Stafford at Trentham, and Lady Elizabeth Whitbread in London, her engagements with the Duchess of Wellington and others, anecdotes of Mme. de Staël, &c., letter about Sydney Smith, an adventure in crossing a bog, p. 216-21; finishes her father's Memoirs, starts for Paris with her sisters Fanny and Harriet, arrival in Paris (April 29, 1820), visits Mme. de Pastoret, at the Court of the Restoration, p. 225-30; visits to Mme. Gautier, meets the Duchesse de Broglie, present at a gathering at the Embassy, receiving and paying visits, an evening at Cuvier's, anecdotes of Bonaparte, p. 231-8; her visit to Mme. Récamier in the Abbaye-aux-Bois, p. 239; ditto, p. 242-5; meets Mme. Suard, takes her to the Opera, meets Mme. de Villette, visits the Orleans' family at Neuilly, interest shown in her father's Memoirs, p. 250-5; meets Les Doctrinaires at Camille Jordan's, her influence upon French society, a discussion upon French and English dandies, spends a day at Mme. de Roquefeuille's at Versailles, amusing account in unpublished letter, p. 255-62; her visit to Switzerland with her sisters, stays near Geneva; meets Dumont, Pictet and other friends, her visit to Coppet, anecdotes of Mme. de Staël, p. 263-8; anecdote of Bonaparte, interesting society of Geneva, finishing her "Sequel to Rosamond," departure from Switzerland, p. 271-5; return to Paris (October 27), various engagements, sees Mdlle. Duchenois in "Athalie," sees Mdlle. Mars in "Mariage de Figaro," &c., p. 276-7; at Mme. d'Escars', at the Delesserts', visit to Mme. de la Rochejaquelein, leaves Paris, her letter from Dover, p. 278-82

Edgeworth, Richard Lovell (father of Maria Edgeworth), visit to Paris arranged, halt in London, tour through Flanders, arrival in Paris, Oct. 29, 1802, p. 2-5; his semaphore telegraph, p. 6; writes of society in Paris, of Thomas Day his early friend, p. 11-13; writes of scientific and literary society, p. 33-4; declines to be presented to First Consul, is ordered to quit Paris, Lord Whitworth's account of the affair, order

Index

- rescinded, p. 52-5; war with England being imminent, decides to quit Paris, arrival at Calais (March 4, 1803), p. 67-8; meets Dr. Burney at Mrs. Crewe's house, p. 89; Lord Byron's words about him, p. 107-8; failing health, continued interest in his daughter's writings, his death, June 13, 1817, his influence upon Maria Edgeworth's life, p. 184-5; Lady Stafford's words "a master mind," p. 217; interest taken by public in his "Memoirs," p. 254-5
- Edgeworth, Mrs. R. L. (née Beaufort), visit to Paris arranged, tour through Flanders, arrival in Paris, Oct. 29, 1802, p. 2-5; writes of Maria Edgeworth's sentiments towards M. Edelcrantz, p. 35-6; at a gathering at the Delesert's, p. 37; describes Maria Edgeworth's power of brilliant conversation in French, p. 45; sees First Consul's apartments in Tuileries, p. 49; writes of Mr. Edgeworth being ordered to quit Paris, p. 53; at Mme. Campan's dramatic entertainment, p. 59; hurried leave of Paris, warning letter from M. Le Breton, p. 67-70; writes of London society in 1813 in unpublished letters, p. 114; ditto, p. 116-19; her visit to the "New Theatre in Drury Lane," p. 120; describes Maria Edgeworth's influence in Parisian salons of 1820, p. 257-8
- Edgeworthstown, Maria Edgeworth's home, p. vi.; compared to Abbotsford, p. vii
- Elizabeth, Princesse, p. 6; p. 149; p. 277
- Epinay, Mme. d', her words about Mme. d'Houditot, p. 57-8
- Escars, Duchesse d', holds Court receptions for Louis XVIII., p. 230; defines difference between English and French dandies, p. 258-9; p. 278
- Etaing, M. d', p. 10
- F
- Fallières, President, "guest of our King and Country," p. ix-x
- Fanshaw, Miss Catherine, in London society of 1813, her drawings for the "Bath Guide," p. 106
- Fashions, Parisian, in 1802, p. 39-42
- Foster, Lady Elizabeth, at La Harpe's house, p. 26; p. 59
- Fouché, Duc d'Otranto, p. 158; at Duke of Wellington's Ball in Paris, August 18, 1815, p. 175-6
- Fox, Charles James, at fête at Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 21; his bust, p. 49
- Fry, Mrs. Elizabeth, p. 218

Index

G

- Gautier, Mme., described by Maria Edgeworth, Rousseau's "Lettres sur la Botanique" addressed to her and to her mother, receives Edgeworths at Passy, her interesting guests, p. 9-11 ; p. 30 ; p. 37 ; offers use of her house during Mr. Edgeworth's banishment from Paris, p. 53 ; visit from Maria Edgeworth in May 1820, p. 231
- Genlis, Mme. de, her "Rosière de Salency" acted, p. 60-3 ; Mme. d'Arblay's words about her, p. 63-4 ; as instructress in the Orleans family, p. 253-4
- Geoffrin, Mme., her portrait by Chardin, anecdote of her connection with the Suards, her generosity, p. 13-15
- George III., his message to Parliament (1803), p. 65-6
- Georgiana, Lady (daughter of the Duchess of Gordon), dances a gavotte with Mme. Récamier, p. 22-4
- Gordon, Duchess of, at Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 22 ; p. 59
- Granard, Lady, her gathering in Paris, p. 229
- Gravelines, p. 3-4

H

- Hénin, Princesse d', accompanies Mme. d'Arblay in her

- flight from Paris, March 19, 1815, p. 160
- Holland, Dr. (afterwards Sir Henry), his anecdote of the Princess of Wales, p. 117-18 ; at Mrs. Carr's fête, p. 206-7 ; p. 218
- Holland, Lady (Henry), receives letter in praise of her father the Rev. Sydney Smith from Maria Edgeworth, p. 221-2
- Holland, Lady, at fête at Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 21
- Holland, Lord, at fête at Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 21
- Hope, Mrs., great gathering at her house described by Maria Edgeworth, p. 115-16
- Houditot (sometimes Houdetot) Mme. d', prototype of Rousseau's "Julie" in the "Nouvelle Héloïse," Maria Edgeworth's description of her, p. 56-7 ; Mme. d'Epinay's words about in her youth Rousseau's words, anecdote of Rousseau, p. 57-9
- Humboldt, Wilhelm von, p. 229

J

- Jordan, Camille, p. 33 ; his pamphlet on Bonaparte, p. 43 ; a déjeuner at his house, p. 255-6

K

- Kergolay, Mme., friend of Lovell Edgeworth, p. 233-4

Index

- Kosciusko, Thaddeus (Polish patriot), p. 33
Kotzebue, August Friedrich Ferdinand von, (German dramatist), his words about Mme. Récamier, p. 18

L

- La Harpe, visit to, described by Maria Edgeworth, p. 25-6
Lally-Tollendal (le Marquis de), his eloquence, p. 33
La Place, Pierre Simon, Marquis de, eminent French astronomer, p. 218
La Rochejaquelein, Henri de, hero of the wars in La Vendée, his portrait, p. 280-1
La Rochejaquelein, Marquis de, second husband of Mme. de La Rochejaquelein, his portrait, p. 280-1
La Rochejaquelein, Mme. (la Marquise) de, heroine of the wars in La Vendée, her Mémoires published in 1815, receives visit from Maria Edgeworth, November 1820, p. 279-81
Laval, Adrien, Duc de, playful words to M. Récamier, p. 245
Le Breton, M., brings Mr. Edgeworth to Paris after his banishment, p. 55; his warning signals of approaching war with England, p. 68-70
Le Kain, actor, p. 27
Leuze, M. de, p. 33
Lescure, M. de, first husband

- of Mme. de la Rochejaquelein, his portrait, p. 280-1
Lille, Rue de, (No. 525) in which Edgeworth family stayed in 1802, its situation described, p. 6-7
Lindsay, Lady Charlotte, meets Maria Edgeworth in 1813, p. 106
Liverpool, Lady, "best authority on points of etiquette," p. 117
Louis XVI., death of, p. 5; p. 149
Louis XVIII., his entry into Paris, May 3, 1814, p. 147-9; considers Bonaparte's escape from Elba as unimportant, his flight from Paris, March 19, 1815, p. 156-7; attended by General d'Arblay, takes refuge in Ghent, p. 160-1; advised to return to France after Battle of Waterloo, p. 165; re-enters Paris, resumes Government July 6, p. 170

M

- Mackintosh, Sir James, with the Edgeworths in the "New Theatre in Drury Lane," p. 120
Mackintosh, Lady, with the Edgeworths in the "New Theatre in Drury Lane," p. 120
Mallet, John Lewis, meets Maria Edgeworth in 1819, p. 218

Index

- Malone, Edmund, p. 183
Malouet, Pierre Victor, Councillor of Louis XVI., p. 43
"Manuscrit de Sainte-Hélène," its appearance in 1817, published by Murray, his letter to Lord Byron upon it, quotation from original document, Maria Edgeworth's opinion of it, acts as a "bomb-shell" in Paris, sensation described by the Comtesse de Boigne, proved to be an imposture, real author Lullin de Chateaueux, p. 189-92
Marcet, Mrs., interesting society at her house, p. 218
Marat, Jean Paul, p. 6
Marie Antoinette, death of, p. 5; p. 149; p. 277
Marmont, Maréchal, his opinion of the "MS. de Sainte-Hélène," p. 192; meets Maria Edgeworth, p. 229
Marmontel, p. 11
Mars, Mdle., celebrated actress, p. 177; seen by Maria Edgeworth in Marriage de Figaro, &c., admired by Mary Berry, p. 277
Maurville, Mme., in Brussels, June 18, 1815, p. 163-4
Mecklenburg, Duke of, at Duke of Wellington's Ball in Paris, August 18, 1815, p. 176
Merry, Mr., Lord Whitworth's secretary, his letter to Mr. Edgeworth, p. 52-3
Mill, James, "excellent in sense and benevolence," p. 218
Mitford, Mary Russell, her strictures on the waltz, p. 118; her devotion to her father, her words about needlework, p. 185-6
Moilliet, Mr., travels with Maria Edgeworth, p. 226; receives visit from her and her sisters at Pregny near Geneva, p. 263
Moilliet, Mrs., travels with Maria Edgeworth, p. 226; receives visit from her and her sisters at Pregny near Geneva, p. 263
Montagu, Mrs., her bon-mot, p. 90
Montigny, Mme. de, niece of Abbé Morellet, p. 11
Montmorenci, Matthieu de, "worthy his great name," p. 33; friend of Mme. Récamier, meets Maria Edgeworth in the Abbaye-aux-Bois, p. 245
Moore, Thos., his words in praise of Maria Edgeworth, p. 108
Morellet, Abbé, Maria Edgeworth's admiration of, a breakfast at his house, p. 11; ditto, p. 56
Murray, John, publishes "MS. de Sainte-Hélène," his letter upon it to Lord Byron, p. 189-90

N

- Nansouty, Mme. de, p. 44-5
Napoleon Bonaparte, his

Index

scheme for the invasion of England, p. ix.; magnificence of his apartments at the Tuileries when First Consul, p. 49-50; at Grand Review in Place du Carrousel, p. 50-2; orders Mr. Edgeworth to quit Paris, p. 52-4; his power rapidly increasing, angry words to Lord Whitworth, p. 65-7; declares war with England, his Decree, preparations for invasion of England, p. 71-5; his defeat at Leipzig (Nov. 1813), p. 132; abdication at Fontainebleau (April 11, 1814), sent to Island of Elba, p. 147; his escape from Elba, Feb 28, 1815, account of his landing in France and rapid march across country given in a letter to Miss Berry, army espouses his cause, enters Paris and assumes government, March 20, his overtures to Mme. de Staël, and to Benjamin Constant, p. 154-9; his army crosses Belgian frontier, June 1815, his defeat at Waterloo, his pursuit, is seen by Alexandre Dumas on his flight, p. 160-8; surrenders himself a prisoner to Capt. Maitland of the Bellerophon, p. 170-1; is sent to St. Helena, his portrait, p. 176-7; art treasures taken by him as spoils of war, p. 178-9; sensation caused by "MS. de Sainte-Hélène," denies authorship, p. 189-92; anecdotes of him, p. 238; his exile of Mme. Récamier, p. 240; his interview with Auguste de Staël, p. 271-2. Necker de Saussure, Mme., (biographer of Mme. de Staël), her definition of Mme. de Staël's character, p. 269-70; Mme. de Staël's words about her, meets Maria Edgeworth in Geneva, p. 273. Nelson, Lord, p. 49. Nerot's Hotel, p. 2. Neuilly, Château de, Palace of the Orleans family, p. 253-4

O

O'Neil, Miss, celebrated actress, p. 28. Orange, Prince of, at Duke of Wellington's Ball, given in Paris, August 18, 1815, p. 176. Orléans, Duc d' (afterwards King Louis Philippe), p. 253-4. Orléans, Duchesse Douairière d', her words about Mme. de Genlis, p. 253-4. Orléans, Mdle. d', p. 253. Ouditot, Mme. d', see under Houditot, d'

P

Paris, life of, in 1802, described by poet Rogers, p. 7-8; Allied Armies enter city, March 31, 1814, p. 140; ditto p. 145; bivouac of Cossacks in

Index

- Champs Elysées, entry of Louis XVIII. (May 3) p. 146-9; "most wonderful show-box in the world," p. 150; curious condition of the city in July 1815, p. 171; ditto p. 180; described by Maria Edgeworth in 1820, p. 233
- Pastoret, M. de (Marquis), at Mme. Gautier's gathering, November 1802, p. 10; formerly President of the First Assembly, p. 30; visits Mr. Edgeworth in his banishment, p. 53; created a peer of France under Restoration, and Vice-President of the Chambers, p. 229
- Pastoret, Mme. de, at Mme. Gautier's gathering, November 1802, p. 10; her house in Place de la Concorde, p. 11; prototype of Maria Edgeworth's "Madame de Fleury," p. 28-9; Maria Edgeworth's praise of, p. 30; p. 43; p. 69; visited by Maria Edgeworth in May 1820, p. 229; p. 231-2
- Panckouke, Mdle., see under Suard, Mme.
- Peace of Amiens ratified in March 1802, p. 1
- Pepys, Sir William, p. 90
- Perrier, Casimir, at breakfast at Camille Jordan's, p. 256
- Petty, Lord Henry, son of Lord Lansdowne, p. 10
- Phillips, Captain Molesworth, arrested under Bonaparte's decree, Lovell Edgeworth's letter to, p. 78
- Pictet, Marc-Auguste, his visit to Edgeworthstown in 1801, descriptions of Maria Edgeworth and her family, p. viii.-ix.; intercourse with the Edgeworths in Paris, 1802, p. 8; p. 38; p. 55: meets Maria Edgeworth in Geneva (August 1820) p. 264
- Place du Palais Bourbon, where Maria Edgeworth stayed in 1820, p. 226
- Pope of Rome lays claim to art treasures taken away from States of the Church, p. 179
- Potemkin, Princess, p. 278-9
- Prony, M. de, "great mathematician," p. 33; head of Engineers des Ponts et Chaussées, p. 43; at gathering at Cuvier's in May 1820, p. 237-8
- Prussia, King of, in Paris in April 1814, p. 146; visits England, p. 150-1; at Duke of Wellington's Ball given in Paris, August 18, 1815, p. 176-7; p. 179
- Prussia, Princes of, at Duke of Wellington's Ball in Paris, August 18, 1815, p. 176

R

- Récamier, M., wealthy banker, his house in the Rue du Mont-Blanc, its magnificence, his Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 17-20; his bankruptcy, p. 240; p. 245
- Récamier, Mme., described by

Index

- Maria Edgeworth, produces "great sensation in public," her modesty, Sainte-Beuve's words about her, Kotzebue's words, origin of friendship for Mme. de Staël, p. 16-18 ; her house in the Rue du Mont-Blanc described by Miss Berry and others, p. 18-19 ; her Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, account of a fête given there, her singing, dancing, and acting, p. 19-25 ; her visit to La Harpe, p. 25-6 ; at Mme. Campan's, p. 33 ; her loss of fortune, takes up residence in the Abbaye-aux-Bois, increased influence over society, descriptions of her cellule, p. 39-45 ; her many friends, portraits do not indicate her character, p. 245-8
- Regent, Prince (afterwards George IV.), at Mrs. Hope's gathering, anecdote of, p. 116
- "Rejected Addresses," by James and Horace Smith, imitation of Byron's style of poetry, p. 120-2
- Régnusat, Mme. de, her Mémoires, p. 44-5
- Robespierre, p. 6
- Robinson, Crabbe, his account of final triumph of Mme. de Staël's "De l'Allemagne," p. 127-8 ; friend of Mrs. Barbauld, his anecdote of Wordsworth hearing her stanza on "Life," p. 213-4
- Rocca, Alphonse, youngest son of Mme. de Staël, p. 272
- Rochemont, Pictet de, translates passages from Mr. Edgeworth's Memoirs for Bibliothèque Universelle, p. 274
- Rogers, Samuel, describes life of Paris in 1802, p. 7-8 ; describes decoration of Mme. Récamier's house, p. 19
- Roland, Mme., death of, p. 5
- Roquefeuille, Mme. de, distributes white cockades before entry of Allies into Paris, March 31, 1814, p. 143-4 ; intercourse with Maria Edgeworth in 1820, p. 235 ; ditto p. 259-62
- Ros, Lady de, p. 235, p. 251
- Rostopchin, Prince, anecdote of, p. 278-9
- Rousseau, J. J., his "Lettres sur la Botanique," written to Mme. Delessert and her daughter, his "herbal of flowers" made for them, p. 9-10 ; Mme. Delessert his benefactress, p. 30 ; his words to "Julie" in the "Nouvelle Héloïse," p. 58 ; anecdote of p. 58-9
- Russia, Alexander, Emperor of, in Paris, April 1814, p. 146 ; his visit to England, June 1814, his popularity, anecdotes of, p. 151-3
- Ruxton, Mrs., aunt of Maria Edgeworth, p. 29 ; p. 34 ; p. 216
- Ruxton, Miss Sophy, p. 35

Index

S

- Sainte-Beuve, his description of Mme. Récamier, p. 17-18; ditto p. 25; of Mme. de Staël's trials inflicted by Napoleon, p. 126-7; of Mme. Récamier's gentle nature, p. 245-6; ditto p. 247-8
- Salis, Baronne de, p. 229
- Salis, Comte de, p. 229-30
- Salis, Comtesse de, p. 229-30
- Scott, Walter (afterwards Sir Walter), describes Maria Edgeworth's personal appearance, p. vii; publication of "Waverley" 1814, his tribute to Maria Edgeworth's genius, p. 96; his words about Lydia White, p. 106; his letters to Joanna Baillie concerning Maria Edgeworth, p. 108-10, at Duke of Wellington's Ball given in Paris, August 18, 1815; his reflections upon the gathering p. 176-7; his words upon state of France in September 1815, his letter to Maria Edgeworth, his friendship with Joanna Baillie and admiration of her "Plays on the Passions," his praise of the "Outlaws' Chorus" in "Orra," p. 197-202; p. 255
- Séjour, Comte de, translates "Belinda" into French, p. 42-3
- Séjour, Mme. (la Comtesse) de, a reading by Chateaubriand given at her house, p. 248-9
- Sévigné, Mme. (la Marquise) de, describes acting of "Esther" at St. Cyr, p. 60
- Sharpe, Sutton (the elder), his drawing of Mme. Récamier's bed-chamber, p. 19; describes fashion of ladies' hair in 1802, p. 41-2
- Siddons, Mrs. (Sarah), p. 27; Sir Joshua Reynold's "Tragic Muse," meets Maria Edgeworth, anecdote of her acting of Lady Macbeth, p. 122-3; Mrs. Richard Trench's tribute to her, her reading of the part of Queen Katherine described by Maria Edgeworth, p. 123-4
- Simpson, James (of Edinburgh), present at Duke of Wellington's Ball given in Paris on August 18, 1815, his account of this memorable gathering, p. 175-7
- Smith, Sir Culling, his tour in Connemara with Maria Edgeworth, p. 222-4
- Smith, Lady, her tour in Connemara with Maria Edgeworth, p. 222-4
- Smith, brothers James and Horace, authors of "Rejected Addresses," p. 121-2
- Smith, Rev. Sydney, describes Maria Edgeworth's conversation, p. 108; her letter about him, p. 221-2
- Sneyd, Miss Charlotte, called

Index

- "Aunt" by Maria Edgeworth, p. 56
- Sneyd, Miss Mary, called "Aunt" by Maria Edgeworth, p. 56; p. 60; p. 63; p. 259; p. 262
- Somerville, Mrs., description of her by Maria Edgeworth, p. 218-9
- Staël, Auguste de, receives visit from Maria Edgeworth at Coppet, corrects "Les dix Années d'Exil" for the press, his anecdotes of his mother, p. 264-8, his strange education, his interview with Bonaparte, p. 271-2
- Staël, Mme. de, origin of friendship with Mme. Récamier, p. 18; her acting, p. 24-5; her account of preparations for invasion of England, p. 73; of English travellers being arrested, p. 77; on her way to England in May 1813, her long exile, difficulty in reaching England, first edition of her book "De l'Allemagne," (10,000 copies) destroyed by Imperial police, arrival in England, final triumph of "De l'Allemagne," p. 125-8; forms a contrast to Lord Byron in society, remarks upon her by Lord Byron, Duke of Wellington, Dr. Bollman, and Miss Berry, p. 128-31; receives overtures from Napoleon during the "Hundred Days," p. 157-8; her devotion to her father, p. 185-6; the Duchess of Wellington's anecdote of her, her visit to Blenheim, p. 219-20; p. 240; p. 242; her death in 1817, p. 264; anecdotes of her life at Coppet and eloquent conversation, p. 264-73; p. 274
- Stafford, Lady, receives visit from Maria Edgeworth at her house at Trentham, p. 217
- Standish, Mr., "an exquisite" at Trentham, p. 217-18
- Stanley, Rev. Edward (some-time Bishop of Norwich), his work "Before and after Waterloo," quoted, p. 27-8; p. 145; p. 180-1
- Stanley, Mrs. Edward, on Royal visitors in London in June 1814, p. 151-3
- Stewart, Mrs. (Dugald), p. 186-7
- Stuart, Sir Charles, English Ambassador in Paris in 1820, p. 232-3
- Stuart, Lady Elizabeth, (wife of the above) receives visits from Maria Edgeworth in May 1820, 132-3; p. 239
- Suard, Jean-Baptiste, "one of the most refined critics," anecdote of his connection with Mme. Geoffrin, p. 12-15; member of Academy, p. 33
- Suard, Mme., née Panckouke, a belle esprit, her description of Mme. Geoffrin's appearance, an anecdote of her generosity, p. 12-15; good company at her house, p. 33 ;

Index

her fear of rioters, visit to Opera with Maria Edgeworth,
p. 250-2

T

- Talleyrand, M. de, Prince de Benevento, p. 54 ; at Duke of Wellington's Ball given in Paris, Aug. 18, 1815, his appearance, p. 175 ; positive in declaring Napoleon to be the author of "MS. de Sainte-Hélène," p. 192 ; his bon mot
à propos of "la Charte," p.
250-1
- Tallien, Mme. (Cabarus), p. 15
- Talma, François Joseph, eminent actor, declaimspassages from Othello and Macbeth,
p. 22 ; his acting of Orestes and of Manlius, p. 27-8 ; in Paris in July 1815, p. 177
- Talma, Mme., her acting of Andromaque praised by Maria Edgeworth, p. 27
- Ticknor, George (American historian), his description of Maria Edgeworth's conversation, p. 108
- Trelawny, Mr., p. 237
- Trench, Mrs. Richard, her tribute to the acting of Mrs.
Siddons, p. 123-4

U

- Uzé, Duchesse d', friend of the Abbé Edgeworth, p. 256

V

- V——, Baronne de, describes a fête at the Château of Clichy-la-Garenne, p. 20-6 ;
her praise of Mme. Récamier,
p. 21
- Vaudreuil, Comtesse de, meets
Maria Edgeworth in Paris
Oct. 1820, p. 276-7
- Verdun, its situation, dreary life of prisoners-of-war there,
p. 79-80 ; brutal conduct of Governor and Commandant, p. 84-6 ; 11,000 English prisoners hurriedly dismissed in January 1814, p. 132-3
- Vergennes, Mme. de, description of her by her daughter,
Mme. de Rémusat, p. 44
- Vestris, Auguste (son of Paco Vestris, called the "Dieu de la Danse"), his gavotte performed at Clichy-la-Garenne,
p. 23-4 ; his dancing described by Miss Berry, p.
40-1
- Villeneuve, Mme. de, friend of Lovell Edgeworth, p. 233-4
- Villette, Mme. de, Voltaire's
"belle et bonne" her affection for Voltaire, p. 252-3
- Vindé, M. de, his "superb gallery of paintings," &c., p.
33
- Vindé, Mme. de, p. 33
- Visconti, Mme., p. 59

W

- Wales, Princess of, desires to form the acquaintance of

Index

- Maria Edgeworth, Mary Berry's words concerning her, Dr. Henry Holland's anecdote of her, p. 116-18
- Walpole, Horace (Lord Orford), his letter concerning the Miss Berrys, his verses addressed to them, p. 103-4; his "Reminiscences of Courts of George I. and II." written for their entertainment, p. 183-4
- War, preparations for, in 1803, patriotism of English nation, p. 72-6
- Waterloo, Battle of, in progress, p. 163-5; news of victory arrives in London June 20, 1815, national excitement, p. 169-70
- Watt, James, p. 43
- Wellington, Duke of, his words upon Mme. de Staël, p. 130-1; in Brussels in May 1815, anecdote of, p. 161-2; his victory of Waterloo, p. 165; arrival of news in London, p. 169-70; restrains his Allies from committing acts of vengeance, his State Ball on Aug. 18, a memorable gathering, p. 171-7; superintends the removal of the "Venice horses" from Arch of the Carrousel, p. 179
- Wellington (Catherine Pakenham), Duchess of, Maria Edgeworth's admiration of, her appearance at an evening party, p. 114; p. 117; her anecdote of Mme. de Staël, p. 219-20
- Whishaw, John, "Pope of Holland House," p. 218
- Whitbread, Lady Elizabeth receives visit from Maria Edgeworth in Kensington Gore, p. 218
- White, Lydia, her salon, Walter Scott's words concerning her, p. 105-6; introduces Maria Edgeworth to Mrs. Siddons, p. 122
- Whitworth, Lord, English Ambassador in Paris in 1802-3, p. 52-3; his official account of Mr. Edgeworth's being ordered to quit Paris, p. 54; Bonaparte's angry words to him during a State reception, p. 66-7; last despatch from Paris, leaves Paris May 12, 1803, p. 71-2; appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1813), Prince Regent's strange remarks, p. 116
- Wilberforce, William, Maria Edgeworth at his house, p. 218
- Wirion, General, Governor of Verdun, his brutal treatment of prisoners - of - war, his shameful end, p. 84-6
- Wordsworth, Miss, p. 214
- Wordsworth, William, his admiration of Mrs. Barbauld's stanza on "Life," p. 214

Y

- Yarmouth, Lady, p. 59
- Yates, Frederick Henry, actor, p. 27
- Yonge, Lady, p. 218

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

THE HOUSE IN ST. MARTIN'S STREET : Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Jane Austen : Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," etc. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and Portraits, etc., reproduced from Contemporary Prints. Demy 8vo, price 21s. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"This delightful work. . . Miss Hill takes for her subject the most charming part of the Burney story—namely, the lovely and pleasant family life in St. Martin's Street."

Times.—" 'Tis a sweet family,' cried Mrs. THRALE, talking about the Burneys, and every fresh record which comes to light only confirms her judgment. Miss Constance Hill writes of the happy little household with all her wonted grace, and the book abounds in quotations from diaries and other documents, hitherto unpublished, and is further enriched with charming illustrations."

Mr. CLEMENT SHORTER, in The Sphere.—"A charming, an indispensable book. . . It is the surprising merit of Miss Hill that she has made the house more vividly interesting than it was before."

World.—"This valuable and very interesting work. . . charmingly illustrated. . . Those interested in this stirring period of history and the famous folk who were Fanny Burney's friends should not fail to add 'The House in St. Martin's Street' to their collection of books."

Literary World.—"A highly interesting book of eighteenth-century gossip. . . This is a tempting book for quotation, for there are no dull pages in it."

JUNIPER HALL : A Rendezvous of Certain Illustrious Personages during the French Revolution, including Alexander D'Arblay and Fanny Burney. By CONSTANCE HILL. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions from various Contemporary Portraits. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Times.—"This book makes another on the long and seductive list of books that take up history just where history proper leaves off. . . We have given but a faint idea of the freshness, the innocent gaiety of its pages; we can give none at all of the beauty and interest of the pictures that adorn it."

Daily Telegraph.—"One of the most charming volumes published within recent years. . . Miss Hill has drawn a really idyllic and graphic picture. . . capitally illustrated by authentic portraits."

Daily Chronicle.—"Miss Hill's artistic and interesting compilation."

Daily News.—"Miss Constance Hill has given a vivid picture of a vanished time."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR

JANE AUSTEN : HER HOMES
AND HER FRIENDS. By CONSTANCE HILL.
With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, together with Photogravure Portraits. Crown 8vo, Price 5s. net.

Athenæum.—"Miss Hill writes well and brightly, with a close knowledge of her subject-matter, and she succeeds in escaping the touch of over-sentimentality which is often irritating in works of this kind. . . . This book provides real and abiding entertainment for Jane Austen lovers."

Times.—"Related with an engaging naïveté."

Daily Chronicle.—"A book of rare and irresistible charm."

Westminster Gazette.—"Miss Hill's investigations are fruitful, and her delightful book is pervaded by a sense of actuality that is not its least charming quality."

Spectator.—"This book is a valuable contribution to Austen lore."

World.—"A thoroughly delightful book."

Literary World.—"Enthusiastic Austenians as we confess ourselves, we hasten to acknowledge our debt to Miss Constance Hill for the addition she makes to Austeniana. The pilgrimage she has made to the homes and haunts of Jane Austen and her friends yields a volume with which we should now be loth to part."

THE STORY OF THE PRINCESS
DES URSINS IN SPAIN (CAMARERA MAYOR). By CONSTANCE HILL. With Twelve
Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. New Edition. Crown 8vo, price 5s. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"A very entertaining and interesting book."

Manchester Courier.—"The work is a fine study of a fine character."

Manchester Guardian.—"There are sides to the character of the Princess which only one of her own sex, and one possessing somewhat of her own character, can thoroughly understand and appreciate. These the writer brings out with charming effect and no small degree of simple skill."

Bookman.—"Nothing could be more charming or more interesting than the way in which Miss Constance Hill has told the story of her fascinating heroine. She has gathered from all sources, chiefly French, every item of correspondence or of reminiscence that throws light upon the career of one of the most talented and most brilliant ladies of that age of charming women."

LONDON: JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO ST., W.
NEW YORK: JOHN LANE COMPANY, 67 FIFTH AVENUE

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE

It has long been a reproach to England that only one volume by ANATOLE FRANCE has been adequately rendered into English; yet outside this country he shares with TOLSTOI the distinction of being the greatest and most daring student of humanity living.

¶ There have been many difficulties to encounter in completing arrangements for a uniform edition, though perhaps the chief barrier to publication here has been the fact that his writings are not for babes—but for men and the mothers of men. Indeed, some of his Eastern romances are written with biblical candour. “I have sought truth strenuously,” he tells us, “I have met her boldly. I have never turned from her even when she wore an unexpected aspect." Still, it is believed that the day has come for giving English versions of all his imaginative works, as well as of his monumental study JOAN OF ARC, which is undoubtedly the most discussed book in the world of letters to-day.

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE

¶ MR. JOHN LANE has pleasure in announcing that the following volumes are either already published or are passing through the press.

THE RED LILY
MOTHER OF PEARL
THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS
THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD
BALTHASAR
THE WELL OF ST. CLARE
THAÏS
THE WHITE STONE
PENGUIN ISLAND
THE MERRIE TALES OF JACQUES TOURNE-
BROCHE
JOCASTA AND THE FAMISHED CAT
THE ELM TREE ON THE MALL
THE WICKER-WORK WOMAN
AT THE SIGN OF THE QUEEN PEDAUQUE
THE OPINIONS OF JEROME COIGNARD
MY FRIEND'S BOOK
THE ASPIRATIONS OF JEAN SERVIEN
JOAN OF ARC (2 vols.)

¶ All the books will be published at 6/- each with the exception of JOAN OF ARC, which will be 25/- net the two volumes, with eight Illustrations.

¶ The format of the volumes leaves little to be desired. The size is Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$ ), and they are printed from Caslon type upon a paper light in weight and strong of texture, with a cover design in crimson and gold, a gilt top, end-papers from designs by Aubrey Beardsley and initials by Henry Osipov. In short, these are volumes for the bibliophile as well as the lover of fiction, and form perhaps the cheapest library edition of copyright novels ever published, for the price is only that of an ordinary novel.

¶ The translation of these books has been entrusted to such competent French scholars as MR. ALFRED ALLINSON, MR. FREDERIC CHAPMAN. MR. ROBERT B. DOUGLAS,

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE

MR. A. W. EVANS, MRS. FARLEY, MR. LAFCADIO HEARN, MRS. W. S. JACKSON, MRS. JOHN LANE, MRS. NEWMARCH, MR. C. E. ROCHE, MISS WINIFRED STEPHENS, and MISS M. P. WILLCOCKS.

¶ As Anatole Thibault, dit Anatole France, is to most English readers merely a name, it will be well to state that he was born in 1844 in the picturesque and inspiring surroundings of an old bookshop on the Quai Voltaire, Paris, kept by his father, Monsieur Thibault, an authority on eighteenth-century history, from whom the boy caught the passion for the principles of the Revolution, while from his mother he was learning to love the ascetic ideals chronicled in the Lives of the Saints. He was schooled with the lovers of old books, missals and manuscripts; he matriculated on the Quais with the old Jewish dealers of curios and objets d'art; he graduated in the great university of life and experience. It will be recognised that all his work is permeated by his youthful impressions; he is, in fact, a virtuoso at large.

¶ He has written about thirty volumes of fiction. His first novel was JOCASTA & THE FAMISHED CAT (1879). THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD appeared in 1881, and had the distinction of being crowned by the French Academy, into which he was received in 1896.

¶ His work is illuminated with style, scholarship, and psychology; but its outstanding features are the lambent wit, the gay mockery, the genial irony with which he touches every subject he treats. But the wit is never malicious, the mockery never derisive, the irony never barbed. To quote from his own GARDEN OF EPICURUS: "Irony and Pity are both of good counsel; the first with her smiles makes life agreeable, the other sanctifies it to us with her tears. The Irony I invoke is no cruel deity. She mocks neither love nor beauty. She is gentle and kindly disposed. Her mirth disarms anger and it is she teaches us to laugh at rogues and fools whom but for her we might be so weak as to hate."

¶ Often he shows how divine humanity triumphs over mere asceticism, and with entire reverence; indeed, he might be described as an ascetic overflowing with humanity, just as he has been termed a "pagan, but a pagan constantly haunted by the pre-occupation of Christ." He is in turn—like his own Choulette in THE RED LILY—saintly and Rabelaisian, yet without incongruity.

THE WORKS OF ANATOLE FRANCE

At all times he is the unrelenting foe of superstition and hypocrisy. Of himself he once modestly said : " You will find in my writings perfect sincerity (lying demands a talent I do not possess), much indulgence, and some natural affection for the beautiful and good."

¶ The mere extent of an author's popularity is perhaps a poor argument, yet it is significant that two books by this author are in their HUNDRED AND TENTH THOUSAND, and numbers of them well into their SEVENTIETH THOUSAND, whilst the one which a Frenchman recently described as " Monsieur France's most arid book " is in its FIFTY-EIGHTH THOUSAND.

¶ Inasmuch as M. FRANCE'S ONLY contribution to an English periodical appeared in THE YELLOW BOOK, vol. v., April 1895, together with the first important English appreciation of his work from the pen of the Hon. Maurice Baring, it is peculiarly appropriate that the English edition of his works should be issued from the Bodley Head.

---

ORDER FORM

190

To Mr. _____ Bookseller

Please send me the following works of Anatole France :

THE RED LILY
MOTHER OF PEARL
THE GARDEN OF EPICURUS
THE CRIME OF SYLVESTRE BONNARD
BALTHASAR
THE WELL OF ST. CLARE
THAÏS
THE WHITE STONE
PENGUIN ISLAND
THE MERRIE TALES OF JACQUES TOURNE-
BROCHE

for which I enclose _____

Name _____

Address _____

JOHN LANE, PUBLISHER, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO ST. LONDON, W.

---

---

NOTICE

Those who possess old letters, documents, correspondence, MSS., scraps of autobiography, and also miniatures and portraits, relating to persons and matters historical, literary, political and social, should communicate with Mr. John Lane, The Bodley Head, Vigo Street, London, W., who will at all times be pleased to give his advice and assistance, either as to their preservation or publication.

---

---

LIVING MASTERS OF MUSIC

An Illustrated Series of Monographs dealing with Contemporary Musical Life, and including Representatives of all Branches of the Art. Edited by ROSA NEWMARCH. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 2s. 6d. net each volume.

- HENRY J. WOOD. By ROSA NEWMARCH.
SIR EDWARD ELGAR. By R. J. BUCKLEY.
JOSEPH JOACHIM. By J. A. FULLER MAITLAND.
EDWARD MACDOWELL. By L. GILMAN.
EDVARD GRIEG. By H. T. FINCK.
THEODOR LESCHETIZKY. By A. HULLAH.
GIACOMO PUCCINI. By WAKELING DRY.
ALFRED BRUNEAU. By ARTHUR HERVEY.
IGNAZ PADEREWSKI. By E. A. BAUGHAN.
RICHARD STRAUSS. By A. KALISCH.
CLAUDE DEBUSSY. By FRANZ LIEBICH.

STARS OF THE STAGE

A Series of Illustrated Biographies of the Leading Actors, Actresses, and Dramatists. Edited by J. T. GREIN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. each net.

\** It was Schiller who said: "Twine no wreath for the actor, since his work is oral and ephemeral." "Stars of the Stage" may in some degree remove this reproach. There are hundreds of thousands of playgoers, and both editor and publisher think it reasonable to assume that a considerable number of these would like to know something about actors, actresses, and dramatists, whose work they nightly applaud. Each volume will be carefully illustrated, and as far as text, printing, and paper are concerned will be a notable book. Great care has been taken in selecting the biographers, who in most cases have already accumulated much appropriate material.*

First Volumes.

- ELLEN TERRY. By CHRISTOPHER ST. JOHN.
HERBERT BEERBOHM TREE. By MRS. GEORGE CRAN.
W. S. GILBERT. By EDITH A. BROWNE.
CHAS. WYNDHAM. By FLORENCE TEIGNMOUTH SHORE.
GEORGE BERNARD SHAW. By G. K. CHESTERTON.

---

---

A CATALOGUE OF MEMOIRS, BIOGRAPHIES, ETC.

---

---

WORKS UPON NAPOLEON

NAPOLEON & THE INVASION OF ENGLAND:

The Story of the Great Terror, 1797-1805. By H. F. B. WHEELER and A. M. BROADLEY. With upwards of 100 Full-page Illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, etc.; eight in Colour. Two Volumes. 32s. net.

Outlook.—"The book is not merely one to be ordered from the library; it should be purchased, kept on an accessible shelf, and constantly studied by all Englishmen who love England."

DUMOURIEZ AND THE DEFENCE OF ENGLAND AGAINST NAPOLEON.

By J. HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D. (Cantab.), Author of "The Life of Napoleon," and A. M. BROADLEY, joint-author of "Napoleon and the Invasion of England." Illustrated with numerous Portraits, Maps, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

THE FALL OF NAPOLEON.

By OSCAR BROWNING, M.A., Author of "The Boyhood and Youth of Napoleon." With numerous Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 x 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

Spectator.—"Without doubt Mr. Oscar Browning has produced a book which should have its place in any library of Napoleonic literature."

Truth.—"Mr. Oscar Browning has made not the least, but the most of the romantic material at his command for the story of the fall of the greatest figure in history."

THE BOYHOOD & YOUTH OF NAPOLEON,

1769-1793. Some Chapters on the early life of Bonaparte. By OSCAR BROWNING, M.A. With numerous Illustrations, Portraits, etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily News.—"Mr. Browning has with patience, labour, careful study, and excellent taste given us a very valuable work, which will add materially to the literature on this most fascinating of human personalities."

THE LOVE AFFAIRS OF NAPOLEON.

By JOSEPH TURQUAN. Translated from the French by JAMES L. MAY. With 32 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

THE DUKE OF REICHSTADT (NAPOLEON II.)

By EDWARD DE WERTHEIMER. Translated from the German. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 21s. net. (Second Edition.)

Times.—"A most careful and interesting work which presents the first complete and authoritative account of the life of this unfortunate Prince."

Westminster Gazette.—"This book, admirably produced, reinforced by many additional portraits, is a solid contribution to history and a monument of patient, well-applied research."

NAPOLEON'S CONQUEST OF PRUSSIA, 1806.

By F. LORAINÉ PETRE. With an Introduction by FIELD-MARSHAL EARL ROBERTS, V.C., K.G., etc. With Maps, Battle Plans, Portraits, and 16 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"Neither too concise, nor too diffuse, the book is eminently readable. It is the best work in English on a somewhat circumscribed subject."

Outlook.—"Mr. Petre has visited the battlefields and read everything, and his monograph is a model of what military history, handled with enthusiasm and literary ability, can be."

NAPOLEON'S CAMPAIGN IN POLAND, 1806—

1807. A Military History of Napoleon's First War with Russia, verified from unpublished official documents. By F. LORAINÉ PETRE. With 16 Full-page Illustrations, Maps, and Plans. New Edition. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

Army and Navy Chronicle.—"We welcome a second edition of this valuable work. . . . Mr. Lorainé Petre is an authority on the wars of the great Napoleon, and has brought the greatest care and energy into his studies of the subject."

NAPOLEON AND THE ARCHDUKE

CHARLES. A History of the Franco-Austrian Campaign in the Valley of the Danube in 1809. By F. LORAINÉ PETRE. With 8 Illustrations and 6 sheets of Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

RALPH HEATHCOTE. Letters of a Diplomatist

During the Time of Napoleon, Giving an Account of the Dispute between the Emperor and the Elector of Hesse. By COUNTESS GÜNTHER GRÖBEN. With Numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

* * * Ralph Heathcote, the son of an English father and an Alsatian mother, was for some time in the English diplomatic service as first secretary to Mr. Brook Taylor, minister at the Court of Hesse, and on one occasion found himself very near to making history. Napoleon became persuaded that Taylor was implicated in a plot to procure his assassination, and insisted on his dismissal from the Hessian Court. As Taylor refused to be dismissed, the incident at one time seemed likely to result to the Elector in the loss of his throne. Heathcote came into contact with a number of notable people, including the Miss Berrys, with whom he assures his mother he is not in love. On the whole, there is much interesting material for lovers of old letters and journals.

MEMOIRS OF THE COUNT DE CARTRIE.

A record of the extraordinary events in the life of a French Royalist during the war in La Vendée, and of his flight to Southampton, where he followed the humble occupation of gardener. With an introduction by FRÉDÉRIC MASSON, Appendices and Notes by PIERRE AMÉDÉE PICHOT, and other hands, and numerous Illustrations, including a Photogravure Portrait of the Author. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Daily News.—"We have seldom met with a human document which has interested us so much."

THE JOURNAL OF JOHN MAYNE DURING

A TOUR ON THE CONTINENT UPON ITS RE-OPENING AFTER THE FALL OF NAPOLEON, 1814. Edited by his Grandson, JOHN MAYNE COLLES. With 16 Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12s. 6d. net.

WOMEN OF THE SECOND EMPIRE.

Chronicles of the Court of Napoleon III. By FRÉDÉRIC LOLIÉE. With an introduction by RICHARD WHITEING and 53 full-page Illustrations, 3 in Photogravure. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

Standard.—"M. Frédéric Loliée has written a remarkable book, vivid and pitiless in its description of the intrigue and dare-devil spirit which flourished unchecked at the French Court. . . . Mr. Richard Whiteing's introduction is written with restraint and dignity."

LOUIS NAPOLEON AND THE GENESIS OF THE SECOND EMPIRE. By F. H. CHEETHAM. With Numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 16s. net.

MEMOIRS OF MADEMOISELLE DES ÉCHEROLLES. Translated from the French by MARIE CLOTHILDE BALFOUR. With an Introduction by G. K. FORTESCUE, Portraits, etc. 5s. net.

Liverpool Mercury.—" . . . this absorbing book. . . . The work has a very decided historical value. The translation is excellent, and quite notable in the preservation of idiom."

JANE AUSTEN'S SAILOR BROTHERS. Being the life and Adventures of Sir Francis Austen, G.C.B., Admiral of the Fleet, and Rear-Admiral Charles Austen. By J. H. and E. C. HUBBACK. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Morning Post.—" . . . May be welcomed as an important addition to Austeniana . . . ; it is besides valuable for its glimpses of life in the Navy, its illustrations of the feelings and sentiments of naval officers during the period that preceded and that which followed the great battle of just one century ago, the battle which won so much but which cost us—Nelson."

SOME WOMEN LOVING AND LUCKLESS.

By THEODOR DE WYZEWA. Translated from the French by C. H. JEFFRESON, M.A. With Numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 7s. 6d. net.

POETRY AND PROGRESS IN RUSSIA. By

ROSA NEWMARCH. With 6 full-page Portraits. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"Distinctly a book that should be read. . . pleasantly written and well informed."

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO : A BIOGRAPHICAL STUDY. By EDWARD HUTTON. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 16s. net.

THE LIFE OF PETER ILICH TCHAIKOVSKY

(1840-1893). By his Brother, MODESTE TCHAIKOVSKY. Edited and abridged from the Russian and German Editions by ROSA NEWMARCH. With Numerous Illustrations and Facsimiles and an Introduction by the Editor. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. Second edition.

The Times.—"A most illuminating commentary on Tchaikovsky's music."

World.—"One of the most fascinating self-revelations by an artist which has been given to the world. The translation is excellent, and worth reading for its own sake."

Contemporary Review.—"The book's appeal is, of course, primarily to the music-lover; but there is so much of human and literary interest in it, such intimate revelation of a singularly interesting personality, that many who have never come under the spell of the Pathetic Symphony will be strongly attracted by what is virtually the spiritual autobiography of its composer. High praise is due to the translator and editor for the literary skill with which she has prepared the English version of this fascinating work. . . There have been few collections of letters published within recent years that give so vivid a portrait of the writer as that presented to us in these pages."

COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS :

The Life of Thomas William Coke, First Earl of Leicester of the second creation, containing an account of his Ancestry, Surroundings, Public Services, and Private Friendships, and including many Unpublished Letters from Noted Men of his day, English and American. By A. M. W. STIRLING. With 20 Photogravure and upwards of 40 other Illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, etc. Demy 8vo. 2 vols. 32s. net.

The Times.—"We thank Mr. Stirling for one of the most interesting memoirs of recent years."

Daily Telegraph.—"A very remarkable literary performance. Mrs. Stirling has achieved a resurrection. She has fashioned a picture of a dead and forgotten past and brought before our eyes with the vividness of breathing existence the life of our English ancestors of the eighteenth century."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"A work of no common interest; in fact, a work which may almost be called unique."

Evening Standard.—"One of the most interesting biographies we have read for years."

THE LIFE OF SIR HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, K.C.M.G., Commander of Li Hung Chang's trained force in the Taeping Rebellion, founder of the first Chinese Arsenal, Secretary to the first Chinese Embassy to Europe. Secretary and Councillor to the Chinese Legation in London for thirty years. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER, Author of the "History of China," the "Life of Gordon," etc. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 2 1s. net.

Daily Graphic.—"It is safe to say that few readers will be able to put down the book without feeling the better for having read it . . . not only full of personal interest, but tells us much that we never knew before on some not unimportant details."

DEVONSHIRE CHARACTERS AND STRANGE EVENTS. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Yorkshire Oddities," etc. With 58 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 2 1s. net.

Daily News.—"A fascinating series . . . the whole book is rich in human interest. It is by personal touches, drawn from traditions and memories, that the dead men surrounded by the curious panoply of their time, are made to live again in Mr. Baring-Gould's pages."

CORNISH CHARACTERS AND STRANGE EVENTS. By S. BARING-GOULD. Demy 8vo. 2 1s. net.

THE HEART OF GAMBETTA. Translated from the French of FRANCIS LAUR by VIOLETTE MONTAGU. With an Introduction by JOHN MACDONALD, Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"It is Gambetta pouring out his soul to Léonie Leon, the strange, passionate, masterful demagogue, who wielded the most persuasive oratory of modern times, acknowledging his idol, his inspiration, his Egeria."

THE MEMOIRS OF ANN, LADY FANSHAWE. Written by Lady Fanshawe. With Extracts from the Correspondence of Sir Richard Fanshawe. Edited by H. C. FANSHAWE. With 38 Full-page Illustrations, including four in Photogravure and one in Colour. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

\* This Edition has been printed direct from the original manuscript in the possession of the Fanshawe Family, and Mr. H. C. Fanshawe contributes numerous notes which form a running commentary on the text. Many famous pictures are reproduced, including paintings by Velazquez and Van Dyck.*

THE LIFE OF JOAN OF ARC. By ANATOLE FRANCE. A Translation by WINIFRED STEPHENS. With 8 Illustrations. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 2 vols. Price 25*s.* net.

THE DAUGHTER OF LOUIS XVI. Marie-Thérèse-Charlotte of France, Duchesse D'Angoulême. By G. LENOTRE. With 13 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. Price 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

WITS, BEAUX, AND BEAUTIES OF THE GEORGIAN ERA. By JOHN FYVIE, author of "Some Famous Women of Wit and Beauty," "Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era," etc. With a Photogravure Portrait and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

LADIES FAIR AND FRAIL. Sketches of the Demi-monde during the Eighteenth Century. By HORACE BLEACKLEY, author of "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess." With 1 Photogravure and 15 other Portraits reproduced from contemporary sources. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{1}{2}$  inches). 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

MADAME DE MAINTENON: Her Life and Times, 1635-1719. By C. C. DYSON. With 1 Photogravure Plate and 16 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

DR. JOHNSON AND MRS. THRALE. By A. M. BROADLEY. With an Introductory Chapter by THOMAS SECCOMBE. With 24 Illustrations from rare originals, including a reproduction in colours of the Fellowes Miniature of Mrs. Piozzi by Roche, and a Photogravure of Harding's sepia drawing of Dr. Johnson. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 12*s.* 6*d.* net.

THE DAYS OF THE DIRECTOIRE. By ALFRED ALLINSON, M.A. With 48 Full-page Illustrations, including many illustrating the dress of the time. Demy 8vo ( $9 \times 5\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 16*s.* net.

HUBERT AND JOHN VAN EYCK : Their Life and Work. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With 41 Photogravure and 95 Black and White Reproductions. Royal 4to. £5 5s. net.

SIR MARTIN CONWAY'S NOTE.

Nearly half a century has passed since Mr. W. H. James Weale, then resident at Bruges, began that long series of patient investigations into the history of Netherlandish art which was destined to earn so rich a harvest. When he began work Memling was still called Hemling, and was fabled to have arrived at Bruges as a wounded soldier. The van Eycks were little more than legendary heroes. Roger Van der Weyden was little more than a name. Most of the other great Netherlandish artists were either wholly forgotten or named only in connection with paintings with which they had nothing to do. Mr. Weale discovered Gerard David, and disentangled his principal works from Memling's, with which they were then confused.

VINCENZO FOPPA OF BRESCIA, FOUNDER OF THE LOMBARD SCHOOL, HIS LIFE AND WORK. By CONSTANCE JOCELYN FFOULKES and MONSIGNOR RODOLFO MAJOCCHI, D.D., Rector of the Collegio Borromeo, Pavia. Based on research in the Archives of Milan, Pavia, Brescia, and Genoa, and on the study of all his known works. With over 100 Illustrations, many in Photogravure, and 100 Documents. Royal 4to. £3. 11s. 6d. net.

\* No complete Life of Vincenzo Foppa has ever been written: an omission which seems almost inexplicable in these days of over-production in the matter of biographies of painters, and of subjects relating to the art of Italy. The object of the authors of this book has been to present a true picture of the master's life based upon the testimony of records in Italian archives. The authors have unearthed a large amount of new material relating to Foppa, one of the most interesting facts brought to light being that he lived for twenty-three years longer than was formerly supposed. The illustrations will include several pictures by Foppa hitherto unknown in the history of art.*

MEMOIRS OF THE DUKES OF URBINO.

Illustrating the Arms, Art and Literature of Italy from 1440 to 1630. By JAMES DENNISTOUN of Dennistoun. A New Edition edited by EDWARD HUTTON, with upwards of 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 3 vols. 42s. net.

\* For many years this great book has been out of print, although it still remains the chief authority upon the Duchy of Urbino from the beginning of the fifteenth century. Mr. Hutton has carefully edited the whole work, leaving the text substantially the same, but adding a large number of new notes, comments and references. Wherever possible the reader is directed to original sources. Every sort of work has been laid under contribution to illustrate the text, and bibliographies have been supplied on many subjects. Besides these notes the book acquires a new value on account of the mass of illustrations which it now contains, thus adding a pictorial comment to an historical and critical one.*

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LONG LIFE. By

JEAN FINOT. A Translation by HARRY ROBERTS. Demy 8vo. (9 x 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 7s. 6d. net.

\* This is a translation of a book which has attained to the position of a classic. It has already been translated into almost every language, and has, in France, gone into fourteen editions in the course of a few years. The book is an exhaustive one, and although based on science and philosophy it is in no sense abstruse or remote from general interest. It deals with life as embodied not only in man and in the animal and vegetable worlds, but in all that great world of (as the author holds) misnamed "inanimate" nature as well. For M. Finot argues that all things have life and consciousness, and that a solidarity exists which brings together all beings and so-called things. He sets himself to work to show that life, in its philosophic conception, is an elemental force, and durable as nature herself.*

THE DIARY OF A LADY-IN-WAITING. By

LADY CHARLOTTE BURY. Being the Diary Illustrative of the Times of George the Fourth. Interspersed with original Letters from the late Queen Caroline and from various other distinguished persons. New edition. Edited, with an Introduction, by A. FRANCIS STEUART. With numerous portraits. Two Vols. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

THE LAST JOURNALS OF HORACE WAL-

POLE. During the Reign of George III from 1771 to 1783. With Notes by DR. DORAN. Edited with an Introduction by A. FRANCIS STEUART, and containing numerous Portraits (2 in Photogravure) reproduced from contemporary Pictures, Engravings, etc. 2 vols. Uniform with "The Diary of a Lady-in-Waiting." Demy 8vo (9 x 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 25s. net.

JUNIPER HALL: Rendezvous of certain illustrious Personages during the French Revolution, including Alexander D'Arblay and Fanny Burney. Compiled by CONSTANCE HILL. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions from various Contemporary Portraits. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

JANE AUSTEN: Her Homes and Her Friends.

By CONSTANCE HILL. Numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, together with Reproductions from Old Portraits, etc. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

THE HOUSE IN ST. MARTIN'S STREET.

Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. By CONSTANCE HILL, Author of "Jane Austen, Her Home, and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," etc. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL, and reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, etc. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

STORY OF THE PRINCESS DES URSINS IN

SPAIN (Camarera-Mayor). By CONSTANCE HILL. With 12 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. New Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

MARIA EDGEWORTH AND HER CIRCLE IN THE DAYS OF BONAPARTE AND BOURBON.

By CONSTANCE HILL. Author of "Jane Austen: Her Homes and Her Friends," "Juniper Hall," "The House in St. Martin's Street," etc. With numerous Illustrations by ELLEN G. HILL and Reproductions of Contemporary Portraits, etc. Demy 8vo (9 x 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  inches). 21s. net.

NEW LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE.

Edited and Annotated by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, with Notes and an Introduction and numerous Illustrations. In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"To the portrait of the man, Thomas, these letters do really add value; we can learn to respect and to like him the more for the genuine goodness of his personality."

Literary World.—"It is then Carlyle, the nobly filial son, we see in these letters; Carlyle, the generous and affectionate brother, the loyal and warm-hearted friend, . . . and above all, Carlyle as the tender and faithful lover of his wife."

Daily Telegraph.—"The letters are characteristic enough of the Carlyle we know: very picturesque and entertaining, full of extravagant emphasis, written, as a rule, at fever heat, eloquently rabid and emotional."

NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE

WELSH CARLYLE. A Collection of hitherto Unpublished Letters. Annotated by THOMAS CARLYLE, and Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, with an Introduction by Sir JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., numerous Illustrations drawn in Lithography by T. R. WAY, and Photogravure Portraits from hitherto unreproduced Originals. In Two Volumes. Demy 8vo. 25s. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"Few letters in the language have in such perfection the qualities which good letters should possess. Frank, gay, brilliant, indiscreet, immensely clever, whimsical, and audacious, they reveal a character which, with whatever alloy of human infirmity, must endear itself to any reader of understanding."

World.—"Throws a deal of new light on the domestic relations of the Sage of Chelsea. They also contain the full text of Mrs. Carlyle's fascinating journal, and her own 'humorous and quaintly candid' narrative of her first love-affair."

THE LOVE LETTERS OF THOMAS CAR-

LYLE AND JANE WELSH. Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, Nephew of THOMAS CARLYLE, editor of "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," "New Letters of Thomas Carlyle," etc. With 2 Portraits in colour and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5½ inches). 2 vols. 25s. net.

CARLYLE'S FIRST LOVE. Margaret Gordon—

Lady Bannerman. An account of her Life, Ancestry and Homes; her Family and Friends. By R. C. ARCHIBALD. With 20 Portraits and Illustrations, including a Frontispiece in Colour. Demy 8vo (9 × 5¾ inches). 10s. 6d. net.

ÉMILE ZOLA: NOVELIST AND REFORMER. AN

Account of his Life, Work, and Influence. By E. A. VIZETELLY. With numerous Illustrations, Portraits, etc. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

Morning Post.—"Mr. Ernest Vizetelly has given . . . a very true insight into the aims, character, and life of the novelist."

Athenæum.—" . . . Exhaustive and interesting."

M.A.P..—" . . . will stand as the classic biography of Zola."

MEMOIRS OF THE MARTYR KING: being a detailed record of the last two years of the Reign of His Most Sacred Majesty King Charles the First, 1646-1648-9. Compiled by ALLAN FEA. With upwards of 100 Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, including relics. Royal 4to. 105s. net.

Mr. M. H. SPIELMANN in The Academy.—"The volume is a triumph for the printer and publisher, and a solid contribution to Carolinian literature."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The present sumptuous volume, a storehouse of eloquent associations . . . comes as near to outward perfection as anything we could desire."

MEMOIRS OF A VANISHED GENERATION
1813-1855. Edited by MRS. WARRENNE BLAKE. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net.

* * * This work is compiled from diaries and letters dating from the time of the Regency to the middle of the nineteenth century. The value of the work lies in its natural unembellished picture of the life of a cultured and well-born family in a foreign environment at a period so close to our own that it is far less familiar than periods much more remote. There is an atmosphere of Jane Austen's novels about the lives of Admiral Knox and his family, and a large number of well-known contemporaries are introduced into Mrs. Blake's pages.

CÉSAR FRANCK: A Study. Translated from the French of Vincent d'Indy, with an Introduction by ROSA NEWMARCH. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

* * * There is no purer influence in modern music than that of César Franck, for many years ignored in every capacity save that of organist of Sainte-Clotilde, in Paris, but now recognised as the legitimate successor of Bach and Beethoven. His inspiration "rooted in love and faith" has contributed in a remarkable degree to the regeneration of the musical art in France and elsewhere. The now famous "Schola Cantorum," founded in Paris in 1896, by A. Guilmant, Charles Bordes and Vincent d'Indy, is the direct outcome of his influence. Among the artists who were in some sort his disciples were Paul Dukas, Chabrier, Gabriel Fauré and the great violinist Ysaÿe. His pupils include such gifted composers as Benoit, Augusta Holmès, Chausson, Ropartz, and d'Indy. This book, written with the devotion of a disciple and the authority of a master, leaves us with a vivid and touching impression of the saint-like composer of "The Beatitudes."

FRENCH NOVELISTS OF TO-DAY: Maurice Barres, René Bazin, Paul Bourget, Pierre de Coulevain, Anatole France, Pierre Loti, Marcel Prévost, and Edouard Rod. Biographical, Descriptive, and Critical. By WINIFRED STEPHENS. With Portraits and Bibliographies. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

* * * The writer, who has lived much in France, is thoroughly acquainted with French life and with the principal currents of French thought. The book is intended to be a guide to English readers desirous to keep in touch with the best present-day French fiction. Special attention is given to the ecclesiastical, social, and intellectual problems of contemporary France and their influence upon the works of French novelists of to-day.

THE KING'S GENERAL IN THE WEST, being the Life of Sir Richard Granville, Baronet (1600-1659).
By ROGER GRANVILLE, M.A., Sub-Dean of Exeter Cathedral.
With Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"A distinctly interesting work; it will be highly appreciated by historical students as well as by ordinary readers."

THE SOUL OF A TURK. By MRS. DE BUNSEN.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

* * * We hear of Moslem "fanaticism" and Christian "superstition," but it is not easy to find a book which goes to the heart of the matter. "The Soul of a Turk" is the outcome of several journeys in Asiatic and European Turkey, notably one through the Armenian provinces, down the Tigris on a raft to Baghdad and across the Syrian Desert to Damascus. Mrs. de Bunsen made a special study of the various forms of religion existing in those countries. Here, side by side with the formal ceremonial of the village mosque and the Christian Church, is the resort to Magic and Mystery.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT

STEPHEN HAWKER, sometime Vicar of Morwenstow in Cornwall.

By C. E. BYLES. With numerous Illustrations by J. LEY PETHYBRIDGE and others. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph.—" . . . As soon as the volume is opened one finds oneself in the presence of a real original, a man of ability, genius and eccentricity, of whom one cannot know too much . . . No one will read this fascinating and charmingly produced book without thanks to Mr. Byles and a desire to visit—or revisit—Morwenstow."

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM BLAKE. By ALEXANDER

GILCHRIST. Edited with an Introduction by W. GRAHAM ROBERTSON.

Numerous Reproductions from Blake's most characteristic and remarkable designs. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net. New Edition.

Birmingham Post.—"Nothing seems at all likely ever to supplant the Gilchrist biography. Mr. Swinburne praised it magnificently in his own eloquent essay on Blake, and there should be no need now to point out its entire sanity, understanding keenness of critical insight, and masterly literary style. Dealing with one of the most difficult of subjects, it ranks among the finest things of its kind that we possess."

GEORGE MEREDITH: Some Characteristics.

By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. With a Bibliography (much enlarged) by JOHN LANE. Portrait, etc. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. Fifth Edition. Revised.

Punch.—"All Meredithians must possess 'George Meredith; Some Characteristics,' by Richard Le Gallienne. This book is a complete and excellent guide to the novelist and the novels, a sort of Meredithian Bradshaw, with pictures of the traffic superintendent and the head office at Boxhill. Even Philistines may be won over by the blandishments of Mr. Le Gallienne."

LIFE OF LORD CHESTERFIELD. An account of the Ancestry, Personal Character, and Public Services of the Fourth Earl of Chesterfield. By W. H. CRAIG, M.A. Numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"It is the chief point of Mr. Craig's book to show the sterling qualities which Chesterfield was at too much pains in concealing, to reject the perishable trivialities of his character, and to exhibit him as a philosophic statesman, not inferior to any of his contemporaries, except Walpole at one end of his life, and Chatham at the other."

A QUEEN OF INDISCRETIONS. The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. From the Italian of G. P. CLERICI. Translated by FREDERIC CHAPMAN. With numerous Illustrations reproduced from contemporary Portraits and Prints. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

The Daily Telegraph.—"It could scarcely be done more thoroughly or, on the whole, in better taste than is here displayed by Professor Clerici. Mr. Frederic Chapman himself contributes an uncommonly interesting and well-informed introduction."

LETTERS AND JOURNALS OF SAMUEL GRIDLEY HOWE. Edited by his Daughter LAURA E. RICHARDS. With Notes and a Preface by F. B. SANBORN, an Introduction by Mrs. JOHN LANE, and a Portrait. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 16s. net.

Outlook.—"This deeply interesting record of experience. The volume is worthily produced and contains a striking portrait of Howe."

GRIEG AND HIS MUSIC. By H. T. FINCK, Author of "Wagner and his Works," etc. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

EDWARD A. MACDOWELL: a Biography. By LAWRENCE GILMAN, Author of "Phases of Modern Music," "Straus's 'Salome,'" "The Music of To-morrow and Other Studies," "Edward Macdowell," etc. Profusely illustrated. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

THE LIFE OF ST. MARY MAGDALEN. Translated from the Italian of an Unknown Fourteenth-Century Writer by VALENTINA HAWTREY. With an Introductory Note by VERNON LEE, and 14 Full-page Reproductions from the Old Masters. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily News.—"Miss Valentina Hawtreay has given a most excellent English version of this pleasant work."

MEN AND LETTERS. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Daily News.—"Mr. Herbert Paul has done scholars and the reading world in general a high service in publishing this collection of his essays."

ROBERT BROWNING: Essays and Thoughts. By J. T. NETTLESHIP. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d. net. (Third Edition.)

WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY. A Biography by LEWIS MELVILLE. With 2 Photogravures and numerous other Illustrations. Demy 8vo (9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches). 25s. net.

\* In compiling this biography of Thackeray Mr. Lewis Melville, who is admittedly the authority on the subject, has been assisted by numerous Thackeray experts. Mr. Melville's name has long been associated with Thackeray, not only as founder of the Titmarsh Club, but also as the author of "The Thackeray County" and the editor of the standard edition of Thackeray's works and "Thackeray's Stray Papers." For many years Mr. Melville has devoted himself to the collection of material relating to the life and work of his subject. He has had access to many new letters, and much information has come to hand since the publication of "The Life of Thackeray." Now that everything about the novelist is known, it seems that an appropriate moment has arrived for a new biography. Mr. Melville has also compiled a bibliography of Thackeray that runs to upwards 1,300 items, by many hundreds more than contained in any hitherto issued. This section will be invaluable to the collector. Thackeray's speeches, including several never before republished, have also been collected. There is a list of portraits of the novelist, and a separate index to the Bibliography.*

A LATER PEPYS. The Correspondence of Sir William Weller Pepys, Bart., Master in Chancery, 1758-1825, with Mrs. Chaponc, Mrs. Hartley, Mrs. Montague, Hannah More, William Franks, Sir James Macdonald, Major Rennell, Sir Nathaniel Wraxall, and others. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by ALICE C. C. GAUSSEN. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo. In Two Volumes. 32s. net.

DOUGLAS SLADEN in the Queen.—"This is indisputably a most valuable contribution to the literature of the eighteenth century. It is a veritable storehouse of society gossip, the art criticism, and the notes of famous people."

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON, AN ELEGY; AND OTHER POEMS, MAINLY PERSONAL. By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

Globe.—"The opening Elegy on R. L. Stevenson includes some tender and touching passages, and has throughout the merits of sincerity and clearness."

RUDYARD KIPLING: a Criticism. By RICHARD LE GALLIENNE. With a Bibliography by JOHN LANE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"It shows a keen insight into the essential qualities of literature, and analyses Mr. Kipling's product with the skill of a craftsman . . . the positive and outstanding merits of Mr. Kipling's contribution to the literature of his time are marshalled by his critic with quite uncommon skill."

APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS. By W. COMPTON LEITH. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

\* The book, which is largely autobiographical, describes the effect of diffidence upon an individual life, and contains, with a consideration of the nature of shyness, a plea for a kindlier judgment of the inveterate case.*

Daily Mail.—"Mr. Leith has written a very beautiful book, and perhaps the publisher's claim that this will be a new classic is not too bold."

THE TRUE STORY OF MY LIFE : an Autobiography by ALICE M. DIEHL, Novelist, Writer, and Musician.
Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF W. J. FOX, Public Teacher and Social Reformer, 1786-1864. By the late RICHARD GARNETT,
C.B., LL.D., concluded by EDWARD GARNETT. Demy 8vo.
(9 × 5 $\frac{3}{4}$  inches.) 16s. net.

* * * W. J. Fox was a prominent figure in public life from 1820 to 1860. From a weaver's boy he became M.P. for Oldham (1847-1862), and he will always be remembered for his association with South Place Chapel, where his Radical opinions and fame as a preacher and popular orator brought him in contact with an advanced circle of thoughtful people. He was the discoverer of the youthful Robert Browning and Harriet Martineau, and the friend of J. S. Mill, Horne, John Forster, Macready, etc. As an Anti-Corn Law orator, he swayed, by the power of his eloquence, enthusiastic audiences. As a politician, he was the unswerving champion of social reform and the cause of oppressed nationalities, his most celebrated speech being in support of his Bill for National Education, 1850, a Bill which anticipated many of the features of the Education Bill of our own time. He died in 1863. The present Life has been compiled from manuscript material entrusted to Dr. Garnett by Mrs. Bridell Fox.

OTIA : Essays. By ARMINE THOMAS KENT. Crown
8vo. 5s. net.

TERRORS OF THE LAW : being the Portraits of Three Lawyers—the original Weir of Hermiston, “Bloody Jeffreys,” and “Bluidy Advocate Mackenzie.” By FRANCIS
WATT. With 3 Photogravure Portraits. Fcap. 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.

The Literary World.—“The book is altogether entertaining; it is brisk, lively, and effective. Mr. Watt has already, in his two series of ‘The Law’s Lumber Room,’ established his place as an essayist in legal lore, and the present book will increase his reputation.”

CHAMPIONS OF THE FLEET. Captains and Men-of-War in the Days that Helped to make the Empire. By EDWARD FRASER. With 16 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo.
6s.

THE LONDONS OF THE BRITISH FLEET :
The Story of Ships bearing the name of Old Renown in Naval Annals. By EDWARD FRASER. With 8 Illustrations in colours, and 20 in black and white. Crown 8vo. 6s.

---

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA 000 589 541 2

